10. So far as the South is concerned, this has the beauty of delaying findings of violations against them. Up to August 10, 1955, (the period covered by the Fourth Interim Report) there had been 12 findings of violations of Article 14(c). In the period since, which coincides almost exactly with the period in which the PAVN have been making an issue of 14(c), there have been only four violations found. Three of these four arose out of mobile team 24's investigations, and the fourth arose out of mobile team 47's investigations. Both these teams were investigating complaints made well over a year ago by the PAVN. The fact that the Commission only got around to finding violations late in August, 1955 in the case of mobile team 47's investigation only reflects the snail-like pace at which the work of the Commission proceeds.

11. The important point to notice from all this is how little the PAVN have achieved for all their effort. The flood of complaints under Article 14(c) really began in earnest about the beginning of August, 1955. At that time, the Commission already was faced with two stalled mobile team investigations under Article 14(c), those of teams 24 and 61. Since the beginning of August 1955, the Commission has eight times decided to appoint a mobile team to investigate PAVN complaints about violations of Article 14(c) in South Vietnam. Not one of these teams has ever begun its investigation. There are thus ten stalled mobile team investigations under Article 14(c) (teams 24, 61, 85, 87, 90, 93, 103, 104, 105 and 10?—not yet numbered). Furthermore, not one complaint the PAVN has made since August 1, 1955 has ever yet resulted in a finding that the South have violated Article 14(c). It is worth contrasting this with the volume of PAVN complaints. In the first three months of 1956 alone, the PAVN wrote 42 letters to the Commission about Article 14(c). In these letters, there were 97 accusations of violations of the Article. Forty-nine mobile teams were requested, to investigate 5,938 alleged arrests, 190 cases of alleged concentration of families, and 101 alleged murders.

12. The only comfort an impartial person can draw from this situation is that it does represent a sort of rough justice. Because the South have virtually no information about what goes on in North Vietnam, it cannot bring many complaints about violations of Article 14(c) to the Commission's attention. The Commission has conducted a bare handful of investigations under Article 14(c) in North Vietnam, and it has never once cited the North for violating the Article. It is about as reasonable to conclude from this that the North have therefore not been violating the Article as it is to conclude they have not been importing arms simply because the Commission has never caught them at it. The argument from silence does not apply in North Vietnam.

13. From this, I think you will be able to catch the atmosphere of futility and frustration which surrounds the Commission's activities under Article 14(c). We would be only to glad to be rid of Article 14(c) and ways and means of accomplishing this purpose are suggested in my memorandum of June 12, 1956, on the reduction of the Commission's activities.

VIETNAM

1. The Commission returned to Hanoi yesterday afternoon June 29.

2. During its three week visit in Saigon the Commission did not make any formal calls on the French or the South Vietnamese. This I think was wise. The Franco-Vietnamese negotiations are sufficiently difficult without the Commission intervention.

3. I have returned to Hanoi somewhat more optimistic about the successful outcome of the Franco-Vietnamese talks and the likely attitude of the Chairman to the formula agreed to by the French and the Vietnamese. Parthasarathi seems to have adjusted his mind to the present ad hoc arrangements and this may well recondition him to adopting a reasonable attitude to whatever agreement is reached by the French and South Vietnamese about the Joint Commission. We should not, however, assume that Parthasarathi will accept without some soul searching the formula for the Joint Commission. He views with concern the possibility of "two non-responsible" parties on the Joint Commission (the French and the South Vietnamese).

4. Parthasarathi's general attitude of the South likewise seems healthy. He had two if not three interviews with Mau and although he spoke to Mau about the need for some gesture from the South Vietnamese on the broad question of a political settlement, I do not think Parthasarathi expects very much on this score. He has indicated to us that from his talks with South Vietnamese officials he is confident that there will be more cooperation.

5. On the question of the Commission moving to Saigon, Parthasarathi plans to raise this matter after whatever new arrangements resulting from the Franco-Vietnamese talks have been put in writing. The problem of the Commission being located in Saigon will be less difficult of solution if, when the South Vietnamese have taken over the liaison function, there is no French or South Vietnamese liaison mission in Hanoi and the PAVN liaison mission has been withdrawn from Saigon. I understood from Mau that this question of the liaison mission was the major impediment to the Commission going to Saigon although of course lack of accommodation may be used by the South as a method to drag its heels.

6. While in Saigon the Canadian delegation worked pretty hard to try and straighten out informally with the United States Embassy and the Vietnamese liaison mission (Col. Nam) problems relating to Articles 16 and 17, principally notifications, which have been plaguing the Commission for some time. Our SMA was able to arrange an informal briefing about MAAG by the United States Embassy for the Indians and ourselves. We also spoke to Col. Nam about 14(c) cases and the need for effective cooperation by the South. I do not think that we went too far in our contacts with the USA Embassy and Col. Nam. We scrupulously avoided giving instructions — what we did might be called "interested coaching".

7. We are reporting separately about TERM. Momentarily everything seems to be on the rails.

INDOCHINA

We had an hour's talk with Krishna Menon this morning about Indochina after which we went together for a talk with Selwyn Lloyd and Lord Reading at the Foreign Office. The talks, I think, did no harm but certainly accomplished very little. Menon was throughout highly inaccurate and displayed only the vaguest acquaintance with the facts. He did not, for example, know the name of the South Vietnamese Foreign Minister and he approached the name Samneua as if he had never seen it before. These shortcomings did not prevent him from suggesting from time to time that he had played the leading role in Geneva in 1954.

2. Menon began by raising a couple of somewhat obscure points concerning the draft letters that Parthasarathi had been proposing. It was impossible to identify the drafts or to understand his arguments very well as he did not seem to know himself what he was quoting from. This argument seemed somewhat futile because he then said that as the Poles and we objected to the letters anyway they had graciously decided to drop them. Aside from firing off a few wild charges in various directions he did have one point about Vietnam which seemed intelligible and which he repeated in several ways to me and again when we were with Lloyd. He emphasized that India would not agree to any wording of the draft letters which would imply alterations of the terms of the Geneva Agreements. The Agreements were the "sheet-anchor" of our position in Indochina, and they could not be changed on the spot. It would be the duty of the Co-Chairmen to make any changes. I said that we had the same attitude to the Geneva Agreements, but expressed our interest in getting some practical arrangements on the basis of which the Commission could function. He also returned to a point he made with me in New York in April and which has some validity. He said Diem must make some gesture towards discussing elections. If there was no progress towards elections there was no term to our mission, and we would not stay forever. I emphasized our anxiety not to be committed there indefinitely, but said it did not seem very practical to think in terms of elections. Menon thought that at least the two sides could talk. Lloyd asked him if he thought Vietnam was partitioned for good. He replied, not very confidently I think, that he hoped not because if it was there would be war between South Vietnam and Cambodia. There was some inconclusive talk about the Joint Commission in which Menon said the ISC must not take over its functions and the British said they didn't think it did much anyway. As for the present difficulties, Menon seemed to have very little knowledge of the state of the Franco-Vietnamese negotiations but he did say that India would not refer the situation back to the Co-Chairmen until they had tried everything.

3. On Laos Menon's chief contribution was to read at length Sen's report of June 13/56 on his talk with Souphanavong and to express confidence that a settlement could be reached. He was particularly pleased that Souvana Phouma had agreed to go to Peking as he was sure that Chou En-Lai would be able to reassure him. The most interesting fact of Sen's report, which you may have seen, was that the Pathet Lao were now saying that they didn't disagree with the January 7/56 resolution, they only disagreed with it at the time because the RLG had the wrong attitude. However, they said this attitude had now changed. Sen also said he was upset when he returned to Vientiane to find that the RLG had decided apparently under Western pressure, to establish diplomatic relations with Saigon. He was sure this would upset the Pathet Lao and Vietminh. Menon made a good deal of this. Both Lloyd and I assured him we had used no influence and, in fact, had never heard of this step by the RLG. I also assured him that we were not in any way trying to prevent a settlement with the Pathet Lao. On the whole he seemed confident about the prospects in Laos and spoke well of Sen. When asked, he emphatically affirmed that India had no intention of going back on the January 7/56 resolution. When he insisted that the Communists themselves had never challenged the position about the administration of the Northern provinces as set out in the resolution, Lord Reading told him firmly that he had not been able to shake Malik in his stolid refusal to consider the resolution, which Malik insisted was an effort to by-pass the Geneva Agreements. Menon said that what the Russians and British thought was not his business; he knew what the Chinese thought.

4. We went over some of the old ground of Cambodia. Menon insisted again that it would take a stone out of the arch of the Geneva settlement to remove the Commission from Cambodia. The Poles would not agree and the Cambodians wanted the Commission to stay. I challenged on the basis of our evidence his sweeping statement about what the Cambodians wanted, but he was, as always, impatient of mere facts. I said to him and to Lloyd that we had reluctantly agreed not to force the issue in Cambodia but only on the basis of maintaining a token representation. Menon said it need only be an office boy. His most disarming gambit was to tell me very confidentially as his own view, not necessarily the view of others, that the Commission must stay in Cambodia because Communism was by no means dead there. We are dealing, he said darkly, with a "Leninist conspiracy" in all the area. We asked him if he thought the Commission was the best way to deal with such dangers and expressed fears about its becoming involved in things outside its scope. He said we should realize that India would never favour the Commission's dealing with things outside its terms of reference. In the course of our talk I gave him my pretty low view of Sihanouk's recent behaviour and we tried, without much success, to reassure him about American intentions in Cambodia and other countries.

5. It was a very depressing performance. I had hoped Menon might be sobered by his new responsibility, but he was at his worst. He showed no consistent knowledge whatsoever of the realities of the Commission and would certainly have shocked Desai or Parthasarathi even more than he did me. His store of knowledge consisted of a grab-bag of assorted false impressions gained during odd controversies over the past two years. In view of the fact that practically all of our discussion was wide of any mark, I don't think we should consider that anything Menon said necessarily supersedes positions established in discussion with more serious Indians.

VIETNAM — INTRODUCTION OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT AND PERSONNEL

We too have been concerned about the implications of United States and United Kingdom statements concerning the import of arms into North Vietnam. On making enquiries recently we found that the statements did in fact have some basis in intelligence reports. There is, however, little prospect that the intelligence information that does exist can form the basis of French or Vietnamese allegations which would enable or force the Commission to institute investigations. Furthermore the trail would be so cold that there would be virtually no prospect of turning up any concrete evidence. To some extent the same considerations apply to any programme based on intelligence leads for plugging holes in order to prevent evasions. This might only lead the Vietminh to take better evasive action.

2. The situation serves to confirm our conviction that Commission control of arms is ineffective not just because of any shortcomings or lack of zeal on the part of the Commission but because the system of control provided for in Cease Fire Agreement is simply inadequate.

3. It appears that in present circumstances there are two courses of action open to us: (1) to make the most of such evidence as exists of Vietminh obstruction of Commission control and (2) to bring out into the open the inadequacies of system of control provided in the Cease Fire Agreement.

4. You will recall that in our telegram Y95 of March 17 we suggested that sustained effort be made to document all cases of Vietminh obstruction of arms control procedures. Most notable instances are Phuc Hoa team and failure to provide water/transport for Haiphong team. There may be other instances of less important character. As suggested in our Y93 of March 16† these cases should be written into next interim report. We appreciate that to achieve this we may have to accept inclusion of more extensive and damaging evidence of South Vietnamese failure to comply with arms control procedures, but this appears to us a necessary evil.

5. Publicizing ineffectiveness of arms control system of Cease Fire Agreement may be more difficult process. We know that Indians are extremely sensitive about any suggestions that Commission has not been performing its task effectively and are likely to balk at any statement that would suggest that since there are loopholes in the control system violations may have taken place without Commission's knowledge. On the other hand we understand that both Indians and Poles are prepared to admit privately that arms control system is ineffective in sense that if either party wished to do so it could violate provisions of Cease Fire Agreement banning import or arms without Commission being any the wiser. We think this fact should be brought out into the open because

(a) there would be then less danger that statements of kind made by United States and United Kingdom would damage prestige of Commission;

(b) it would dispel any illusions that may exist about effectiveness of international supervision system which obtains in Indochina; and

(c) it would lay the foundation for proposals that fixed teams ultimately be withdrawn, thus permitting substantial reduction in size of our delegation as suggested in our telegram Y104 of March 23.

6. Our idea is that facts of limited effectiveness of control system in Vietnam should be presented completely impartially, without any suggestion that, either side is taking advantage of loopholes that exist. Possibly arguments of following type might be employed in putting the case to the Indians and Poles:

(a) Sooner or later one party or other is likely to call attention to inadequacies of control system, and might well do so in manner which would reflect adversely on Commission or some of its members: consequently it would be desirable for Commission to do this on its own initiative and in an impartial fashion, without calling into question good faith of either party; moreover Commission owes it to itself to ensure that facts are generally understood;

(b) Both Vietnamese governments and Geneva Conference powers generally should be apprised of shortcomings of control system, so that they may suggest changes if they wish to do so: Commission is in best position to record facts of situation fairly;

(c) If in future international control methods are again considered as means of preserving peace precedent of Indochina is sure to be studied just as Korean precedent was studied in case of Indochina; Commission should accordingly see that the record is complete so that there are no misconceptions anywhere about working of control system in Indochina.

7. Actual nature of statement showing up inadequacies of system could probably be drafted in a way which would not concentrate on likelihood of violations in view of known loopholes. Full description of Commission's actual control procedures (from which shortcomings would be readily apparent) together with observation that proper fulfilment of the provisions of the Cease Fire Agreement with respect to import of arms depends more upon good faith of parties than on existing control procedures would probably be sufficient.

8. Obvious place for statement of this kind is in an interim report. As Seventh Report is probably many months off it would clearly be advantageous to get the statement into the Sixth Report. If you see no strong objections to this project we suggest you begin by discussing the matter informally with Parthasarathi, using any arguments that may occur to you in addition to those outlined above to commend the case to him.

REDEPLOYMENT OF MOBILE TEAM AT PHUC HOA

1. Secretary General has requested delegations to appoint members to new mobile team at Phuc Hoa to replace MT 99. This action follows receipt of PAVN letter dated July 19 in which PAVN reiterate their arguments regarding the difference between mobile and fixed teams but agree to the deployment of another team at Phuc Hoa. The PAVN letter emphasizes that this team will be a mobile team (this clearly implying that the team will not be of indefinite duration as far as the PAVN is concerned) and states that in regard to the period of activity of the team "The Liaison Mission will talk this matter over with the IC at a later date".

2. We should appreciate your advice as to the line we should follow in this matter. As I mentioned in my telegram under reference the Commission on May 15 sent a strong letter to the PAVN stating that the decision to withdraw the team had been forced on the Commission because of the refusal of the PAVN High Command to implement the recommendation of the Commission and to extend the necessary cooperation to the team. The Commission also strongly urged the PAVN to reconsider its attitude and give the necessary cooperation to enable the Commission to exercise control at Phuc Hoa.

3. On May 29 the PAVN replied to the Commission letter presenting again its arguments against indefinite duration of this mobile team and making the usual hypocritical statements about the close cooperation which has been provided by the PAVN. On July 7 the Commission informed the PAVN that the keeping of a mobile team in continuous operation in the regions bordering the land or sea frontiers of North Vietnam is not contrary to Article 35 and stated that it expected the PAVN to give logistic support and all assistance to enable the Commission to again deploy a team at Phuc Hoa. The Commission's letter stated that the fact that the Commission was forced to withdraw MT 99 was clear proof that the PAVN had not implemented the Commission's recommendations.

4. These steps by the Commission have been taken by a majority vote with the Pole dissenting in Commission meetings.

5. We have three possible courses of action open to us

(1) we could participate in the new mobile team or

(2) could refuse to supply a member for the team on the grounds that control at Phuc Hoa had degenerated into (group corrupt) and that we did not want to lend ourselves to a continuation of it or

(3) we could refuse to supply a member until PAVN assured Commission that they would not again force withdrawal.

6. We of course have grounds for refusing to participate in the new team. Policy periods during which there has been no team at Phuc Hoa have been long enough to enable the PAVN to import whatever military equipment they wished to and so the question of control has become purely academic. Our refusal to participate in the team would be a strong statement of principle in which we refused to associate ourselves with an action which in essence is exactly what the PAVN has agreed to all along and which a majority of the Commission has said is not its wishes. On the other hand we would end up with no control whatever at Phuc Hoa and our general position that some control is better than no control would be undermined. In addition the Indians might interpret our refusal as unreasonable and quixotic and in any future discussion of Phuc Hoa might act less strongly against the Poles and the PAVN. (Or course we should not discount the possibility that the Indians might welcome a strong line by us at this stage).

7. If we agree to participate in the team we could put all our arguments on record. We should state that we consider that the Commission has been given the run around by the PAVN in this issue, that as long as there are gaps between the mobile teams at Phuc Hoa control cannot possibly be effective and indeed provides a convenient schedule for the illegal importation or war material and that the PAVN has refused both to accept Commission's interpretation of its powers and to extend cooperation required to ensure effective control. We could also (wish?) for a strong letter from the Commission to the PAVN which would demand from the PAVN assurance that the new mobile team would not be forced to withdraw from Phuc Hoa until the Commission decided that it had carried out its task satisfactorily and we could add that if this new team were forced to withdraw we would not participate in another one and thus carry on the farce. (Alternatively we might refuse to supply a member until the PAVN provided these assurances. The same arguments could be put on the record if we followed this course).

8. During any discussion we might draw a parallel between the team at Phuc Hoa and Teams 24 and 61 which as you know were withdrawn from the South last fall because of the conditions set down by the Southern authorities. This question of principle was discussed under Item 11 of Meeting 249 and Item 1 of Meeting 2509. If you should instruct us to follow courses (2) or (3) (para 4) we might set the stage for progressive reduction of teams and indeed even raise the curtain for an honest study of the effectiveness of control under the Agreement 10. We should appreciate your advice about our course of action as soon as possible. The team is supposed to be briefed on July 25 but we are informing the Indians that we cannot provide a team member at this moment because of rotation and because our team member at Laoka has just developed malaria. These excuses will not last very long however and we should appreciate having instructions no later than July 26.

REDEPLOYMENT OF MOBILE TEAM AT PHUC HOA

We have considered three courses of action outlined in your paragraph 5 and the Minister has indicated a preference for the third. You should therefore refuse to supply a member for the team until Commission has PAVN written assurances that they would not again force withdrawal.

2. You should use arguments contained in your paragraphs 7 and 8 and ensure that they are on Commission record. We think this provides good opportunity to start implementing plans suggested in our telegram YY96 of July 18.

SIXTH INTERIM REPORT — ARTICLES 16 AND 17

Your telegram under reference arrived a few days after the Indian draft of the Sixth Interim Report was distributed. Although we probably would have had time to prepare a statement along the lines suggested in paragraph 7 of your telegram, we concluded that our approach to the Indians and the Poles on the subject would have seemed suspiciously abrupt. If our initiative in the matter is to be successful, I think the ground must be prepared fairly carefully. As you mention, the Indians are very sensitive about any suggestions that control is not effective, and although any assessment of control procedures could emphasize the inadequacies of the control provisions contained in the Ceasefire Agreement, it would be extremely difficult to exclude from any comprehensive assessment mention of shortcomings resulting directly from decisions which were taken by the Commission on its own initiative or as a result of compromise with the parties.

2. It seems to us that the best way to avoid wounding Indian sensibilities would be to approach the subject casually with Parthasarathi and try to get him to put forward the idea as his own. This, I admit, will be difficult and if we were to miss our chances in the Sixth Interim Report and fail to get the Indians to adopt the idea, we would lose out completely. However, paragraph 8 of the draft Sixth Interim Report mentions the possibility of a special report to the Co-Chairmen about the solution of the Commission's difficulties and we think this special report would be the logical place for an assessment of control under Articles 16 and 17. We hope that the Indians would agree with this. This would give us time to work the Indian around to our way of thinking and probably produce better results than pulling our suggestion out of thin air in the midst of discussions on the Sixth Interim Report. In another month or two we suspect that the (2 groups missing) of the South will look much better and this also would put us on firmer ground; at the moment our suggestion for an assessment might be interpreted as an attempt to throw the burden of guilt off the South, while later on our impartiality might be more apparent.

3. Despite all these considerations we shall try to keep the door open. We plan to propose amendments to Chapter V which, by their phrasing, will point up the inadequacies of the control system itself and as well suggest an amendment which would point out the difficulties of control which can be attributed to the terms of reference within which the Commission works. This would then give us a peg on which to hang a later assessment of control provisions, and at the same time might start the Indians thinking along the same lines that we are. (We of course would provide them with all the encouragement possible).

4. You may rest assured that we shall do all we can to have included in the report all cases of PAVN obstruction of control procedures. Phuc Hoa and the Baie d'Along are our main weapons. You suggested in your telegram Y95 March 17 that we make use of circumstantial evidence to build a case against the PAVN and in your telegram Y93 March 14† you refer to the Sixth Interim Report as an occasion for bringing to light the devious methods used by the PAVN. We of course agree with these tactics, but unfortunately the PAVN methods have been so devious that we have not very much circumstantial evidence on which to build a case. If we go too far in this sort of thing we always run the risk of convincing the Indians that our main goal is to sink the knife into the PAVN; this of course would make it all the more difficult for us to convince them that we are approaching the problem of an assessment of control procedures with Olympian disinterestedness.

5. From the above you will see that we agree with you in principle but we much prefer to carry out the plan in two phases. Two bucks and a kick may be better on this issue than a forward pass which might be intercepted.

U.S. VIEWS CONCERNING THE FUTURE OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION IN VIETNAM

You may be interested to read an extract from a report dated June 25 by David McNicol, Australian Minister in Saigon, on the views of two United States representatives there concerning the future of the International Commission in Vietnam.

(a) Bill Sebald, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, takes the tough line that what deters aggression from the north is not the presence of the Commission but Communist knowledge that the free world would retaliate.

(b) Fred Reinhardt, United States Ambassador, thinks the Commission should stay on until the beginning of 1957 as 1st January, 1957, is the approximate target date for having the Vietnamese army sufficiently trained and organized to delay an invasion from the north until other help is forthcoming.

2. "W. Sebald, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, visited Saigon last week.

"I was told separately by Reinhardt and another member of his staff that Sebald was not at all convinced that the continuing presence of the International Commission was a good thing. Reinhardt said, in strict confidence, that his own view was that the Commission should stay on until the beginning of 1957 as 1st January, 1957, was the approximate target date for having the Vietnamese Army sufficiently trained and organised to delay an invasion from the north until other help was forthcoming.

"I got an opportunity to ask Sebald what he thought of the usefulness of the Commission. He replied that he had not made up his mind, but went on to make the following comments which showed he thought the Commission was a luxury which could be done without:

"(a) What deters aggression from the north is not the presence of the Commission but Communist knowledge that the free world would retaliate.

(b) We got the Commission in Korea into the demilitarised zone. 'People said we could never achieve this, but I knew in my heart we could.'

(c) The United States is not a party to the Geneva Accords. The Co-Chairmen have taken upon themselves authority which has not been given to them.

(d) The possibility of teaching the Indians something about Communist subversion is a high price to pay for the continuation of the Commission."

Our Comment

3. You will remember that Sebald was a pre-war lawyer in Japan and a war-time Commander in the U.S. Navy who succeeded George Acheson as head of Diplomatic Section of SCAP and in this capacity served as the tool of the clique of military officers about General MacArthur. He was later Ambassador in Burma and has been deputy to Walter Robertson since then. He is not considered to have a particularly subtle mind and is regarded as generally reflecting Pentagon military appreciations of the situation in the Far East. Nevertheless it is of some significance to us that this group in the United States Government tend to regard the Commission in Vietnam as having outlived its usefulness.

4. Reinhardt is a more thoughtful and better informed observer of the Vietnam scene. It is interesting, therefore, that he has observed that the Commission might safely withdraw early in 1957. We shall make inquiries about his statement that the South Vietnamese Army would be in an adequate state of readiness by January 1, 1957. The reports which we have had from our own military advisers in Vietnam have not been quite so optimistic and have implied that the South Vietnamese army has not yet achieved the ability to operate on a larger than battalion scale. You will recall that we have taken the view that the Commission still had certain useful functions to perform: as a stabilizing factor in Vietnam and in the Far East generally, as a witness in the event of possible Viet Minh aggression or active subversion, as a balancing factor pending the completion of a political settlement in Laos, and most important, as a means of gaining time for the South and the other free countries in Southeast Asia to put their houses in order. On the basis of this enumeration of considerations, it will be of considerable significance to us if the South Vietnam Government, and the United States Government as its principal backer, should consider that the International Commission is no longer required. Now that July 20, 1956 has passed without trouble I think we might consider once again re-assessing the role of the Commission in Vietnam and the views of our principal allies on this subject.[32]

5. Even if we should determine that the process of reduction of activities and withdrawal could be safely set in motion towards the end of this year or early 1957, a good deal of careful thought will have to be given to the way this can be achieved smoothly. Our guess is that the Indians, who have some pride in the role they have been playing as Chairmen of the Commission, might be reluctant to withdraw on the basis of the same considerations that we might consider valid. It is more likely that they would find it easier to withdraw blaming the South and their American supporters for intransigence and lack of effective co-operation. This might have an unfortunate effect on Indian-American relations and it would be difficult for us to avoid some Indian resentment. It is, therefore, going to be necessary for us to play our cards very carefully and discreetly. We might also hope that our American friends do not state publicly that they would like the Commission to withdraw as this would certainly make our task more difficult.[33]

REDEPLOYMENT OF MOBILE TEAM PHUC HOA

You will recall that in paragraph three of my telegram under reference I said that I had avoided dealing with this subject informally with Parthasarathi. After giving the matter further thought and discussing it with my SMA I concluded that it would be more honest on my part to tell Parthasarathi what I planned to do. This I have done and I now have a personal request from Parthasarathi to you asking that we do not insist on the Commission's receiving written assurances from the PAVN that the team would not again be forced to withdraw before supplying a member. I told Parthasarathi that I would convey his request.

2. Parthasarathi feels that for us to adopt this attitude at this time would be unfortunate and possibly dangerous as a precedent if we are keen to maintain the cease fire structure. As he put it, the structure is at present insecure and we should all try to avoid shaking the foundations too vigorously. Parthasarathi fears that if we refuse to participate without written assurances the Poles will insist on similar assurances from the South for every team and reconnaissance. This he thinks might scuttle the limited cooperation which we are getting from the South. Parthasarathi continues to think that we are in for a difficult time over the next few months in just maintaining the structure of the Cease Fire Agreement. He argued that we should not adopt postures which might make it more difficult for the Commission to argue that the degree of cooperation given by the South is adequate.

3. I told Parthasarathi that we felt very strongly about this matter and I put forward the arguments which we had outlined in paragraphs 7 and 8 of our telegram under reference.

4. It is difficult to perceive clearly the future of the Commission. Personally I would recommend that we go once more to Phuc Hoa on the understanding that this is the last occasion. I continue to be concerned about the cooperation which the Commission will get from the South. If we want to keep the Commission in operation for a while longer we may have to give in on some things in order to be able to argue that the cooperation extended to the Commission by the South if not of a kind expected is at least sufficient for the Commission to maintain the structure of the Agreement. In any event I would read into the record all our criticisms of the PAVN's attitude towards the Phuc Hoa case.

SIXTH INTERIM REPORT — ARTICLES 16 AND 17

I spoke informally this morning to Parthasarathi about the general questions raised in your telegram under reference and brought forward the arguments contained in paragraph 6. I suggested that the Sixth Interim Report might be an appropriate place for some brief reference to the control system. I did not get very far with Parthasarathi. While he was prepared to admit personally the inadequacies of the present control system he argued that for the Commission to admit that the control system is ineffective could leave it open to anyone to question not only the existence of the Commission but the maintenance of the Cease Fire Agreement. He suggested that the Pole would argue that if the party in the South had since the time of the cease fire given full cooperation the control system there would have worked satisfactorily. The Pole would also point out that there (have?) been no allegations against the North. Through tactics such as these the Pole would in Parthasarathi's view cloud the whole issue.

2. Parthasarathi did not seem to be inalterably opposed to an assessment of the control system if the Commission were asked by the Co-Chairmen to do one. He argued however that any improved control system based on the present Cease Fire Agreement would require fixed teams to operate 24 hours daily which would imply three shifts. Teams would also have to be given modern equipment which the parties are unable or unwilling to provide and which would have to be provided by the other Geneva Powers or the Commission members. On the other hand an effective control system of a kind different than that provided (five groups missing) agreement would require amendments to the Agreement and Parthasarathi did not think that the PAVN would be prepared to accept them if it meant more rigid control. Further to amend the Agreement at this time when we have no "formal" party in the South (groups corrupt) a difficult matter.

3. At the conclusion of our conversation I was satisfied that I would get no support from Parthasarathi for any comprehensive insertion in the Sixth Interim Report about the ineffectiveness of the present control system. Indeed I concluded that we were over sanguine when in our telegram under reference we said we would try to keep the door open by making even a brief reference to the question. We still however will try to get some form of wording inserted which might give us a peg on which we can hang something later.

4. I wonder however whether we should not consider the possibility of trying to get the Co-Chairmen to ask the Commission to make an assessment of the control system. It seems to me this may be the only method by which your proposal can be implemented.

The special report on the response of the parties which Parthasarathi is anxious to do in about 6 weeks time after August 15 might be an appropriate occasion for this.

REDEPLOYMENT OF MOBILE TEAM AT PHUC HOA

We quite agree that it was wise to discuss the subject with Parthasarathi. After careful consideration of Parthasarathi's arguments, however, we still prefer the third course of action outlined in paragraph 5 of your telegram 244 of July 23. We do not, of course, wish to upset the cease fire structure but we think a clear distinction can be made between this and certain provisions of the Cease Fire Agreement, which have proved to be unworkable. If the cease fire did in fact depend upon the effective enforcement of such Article as 17, 14(c) and 14(d), it would long since have collapsed.

2. To all intents and purposes the supervision of Article 17 is already ineffective. We do not think that what we propose to do would further paralyse the Commission. Paralysis already exists and we are merely proposing to discontinue the pretence that it is working. We doubt if any steps the Poles might take in retaliation would change the situation very much. Has the Commission not on previous occasions refused to send teams on Southern missions because there were no assurances that they could carry out their tasks? We do not want to expose the South to criticisms, but we are not disposed to play the role of blind advocate for South if it refuses cooperation. What we want to do is illustrate that North is also very much at fault and this case gives us a chance to do this. If as a result the machinery of supervision grinds to a full stop, we should be in a better position to consider realistically the functions of the Commission.

3. Unless you have further strong objections, therefore, you should carry on with instructions contained in our telegram YY126 of July 26 as a start in implementing plans suggested in our telegram YY96 of July 18. We think it important, however, that in doing so you do not indicate to Parthasarathi our long-range intentions but continue to argue case along lines of paragraphs 7 and 8 of your telegram 244.

INTRODUCTION OF MILITARY EQUIPMENT INTO SOUTH VIETNAM

At the moment, this question is obscured by a tangle of loose ends which have been accumulating for months and which may take some time to tidy up. Before dealing with the points raised in your telegram under reference, I shall review the more recent developments.

2. The Commission has received 2 letters from the Government of South Vietnam which might be described as policy statements about the import of war equipment. The June 1 letter, to which your YY133 refers, was forwarded by the French Liaison Mission June 16 and it stated that all info regarding the exit and entry of military personnel and equipment had been communicated to the Commission through the FLM. About the export of military equipment in particular, the letter stated that the Government of South Vietnam "reserves the right, for each shipment exported, to bring in subsequently a corresponding or lesser quantity of the same category". The FLM was asked to inform the Commission of this general reservation of rights which "tacitly covers all our exports of war material".

3. A second letter, dated June 11, and forwarded by the FLM June 25, set out the conditions under which the Commission could exercise control over the entry of war material.

4. The June 1 letter was considered by the Commission on July 4 and since the second letter, dealing with control procedures, was still awaiting consideration, it was decided to send only an interim reply to the first. In this reply the Commission stated that "it desires to make it clear that any import can only be made in terms of Article 17 of the Geneva Agreements; the procedure as laid down in Protocol 23 must also be followed".

5. The letter dealing with methods of control was discussed July 11. The Chairman considered the South Vietnamese suggestions to be at variance with existing procedures under Article 17 and Protocol 23. He produced a draft reply in which the FLM were informed that the South Vietnamese proposals were unacceptable to the Commission, and in which the provisions of Article 17 and Protocol 23 were outlined. The Pole, of course, agreed with the Chairman, but I contended that the main concern of the Commission was to ensure that the degree of control exercised by it was not repeat not lessened. I suggested referring the SVN letter to Ops Committee, which could compare the suggestions with past Commission practice. The Chairman would not repeat not accept this, but agreed to give us time to study his draft reply.

6. The Indians were to prepare a new draft on the basis of amendments submitted by both us and the Poles. However, the Chairman has not repeat not produced this, and I would expect the issue to remain dormant for a time.[34]

7. It is clear from the Commission's reply to the June 1 letter that the importation of military equipment is governed by Article 17 and Protocol 23. This reflects the majority view of the Commission, which is more rigid than the Canadian stand. We maintain that effectiveness of control should be the prime consideration and that not repeat not too much emphasis should be placed on Protocol 23, which is simply a modus operandi agreed to by the parties. There is no doubt however, about the minority nature of this stand, and to the Indians and the Poles the Protocol possesses substantially the same authority as Article 17. As far as we know the Commission's approval of Protocol 23 is only implied. Paragraph 18 of the second interim report[35] refers to it with satisfaction, and of course the Commission has implicitly accepted the Protocol as authoritative for past 18 months. It could be argued that the South was not repeat not a party to the administrative arrangements embodied in Protocol 23, but this argument would not repeat not carry much weight with the Indians or Poles.

8. If Article 17 and Protocol 23 are applied strictly, then it is difficult to see how post facto notifications of exports would help the SVN cause. According to Protocol 23, the Commission has to verify that equipment is destroyed, damaged, worn out or used up, and this would be impossible if Commission teams have not repeat not checked exports. The French may have some reservation about replacing exported equipment, but we have no repeat no record of it. No repeat no minutes of the Central Joint Commission exist, and the PAVN could be relied on to deny that such an oral reservation was ever made.

9. We are unhappy about the pressure now being applied by the USA, since it places us in a very uncomfortable position. A dilemma seems to be emerging along the following lines: we are pretty sure that the Indians and the Poles will not repeat not at present buy our argument that exported military equipment may be replaced. Therefore we have put off the Legal Committee's decision in the hope that you could produce a legal argument which would sway the Indians. We have not repeat not yet received the necessary interpretation, but have been content to let the matter lie, feeling that no repeat no decision would be better than a decision against the interests of SVN. In the meantime, however, the majority of the Commission does not repeat not accept the replacement argument. Now the USA wants us to support the view that the South has the right to replace equipment shipped out since 1954. This would involve opening the question up[36] and probably could result in a majority decision that the South does not repeat not have this right. Moreover, the Indians and the Poles are unlikely to agree that a non responsible party which is not repeat not a successor in function to the French can enjoy successor rights. Either way the South loses. Your paragraph 7 seems to indicate that you suggested to the USA that the South, by ensuring that its current import requirements were balanced off against its export notifications, could avoid a "technical violation" of Article 17. This is true if the exported equipment is destroyed, damaged, worn out or used up, and if the Commission, through its teams can

VIETNAM — INTERPRETATION OF ARTICLE 17

Legal Division has indicated that while they still believe that text of Article 17 hardly leaves room for an interpretation different from that given in our telegram Y147 of April 25,† they agree that an argument could be made on the following lines: Begins:

(a) Armistice agreements usually contain some military clauses; and the military clauses of the Cease-Fire Agreement for Vietnam — such as that prohibiting reinforcements in personnel and armaments — are meant to safeguard the military balance which existed at the time of the cessation of hostilities. Thus, in Article 16 thereof (dealing with military personnel) and in Article 17 (which relates to war material) the Geneva negotiators have laid down a prohibition of "reinforcements". The first paragraph of Article 17 records a prohibition of such reinforcements by way of a build-up of armaments; while the rest of the Article could (perhaps) be deemed merely a scheme to prevent this prohibition from placing the parties in a position where they would be incapable of replacing the war material which they may be losing (through wear and tear, consumption, etc.) after the cessation of hostilities. Such importation of war material which would not be an augmentation of the strength of a party as of July 22, 1954, would not be contrary to Article 17(a) of the Geneva Agreement. If, then, war material has been exported for one reason or another, it can be said that an equal quantity of war material could be imported at a later date because such importation would not result in a "reinforcement" as prohibited in the first paragraph of Article 17(a). — Such reasoning leads to the conclusion that the South Vietnamese would be at liberty (under Article 17(a)) to import war material if war material had been

[37] Note marginale :/Marginal Note:
At ceasefire (presumably) A.R. M[enzies] exported. The only condition to such importation being the giving of some kind of evidence that the importation in question would not result in an actual reinforcement.

(b) The "replacement scheme" provided for in the paragraphs (b), (c), (d), (e) and (f) of this Article is, in fact, of a different nature than the question of reinforcement. As stated above, the intent of the military clauses of the Agreement is to maintain the status quo as it existed on July 22, 1954. It can be said that the prohibition of reinforcements might not have been sufficient to fulfil that purpose and this is why the replacement scheme has been provided for, i.e., to safeguard the balance of power.

(c) The procedure laid down in paragraphs (c), (d), (e) and (f) of Article 17 is designed to insure that the replacement scheme may be carried out effectively. This procedure must be followed in case of replacements but it could be argued that it is not necessarily applicable in cases of importation of war material which is not a replacement of materials destroyed, damaged, worn out or used up; in such cases it would only be incumbent on the parties to prove that the importation will not result in reinforcements. Ends.

2. We have no objection to your trying out these arguments in the Legal Committee in the hope that they can make some impression on the Indian Delegation. Where appropriate the argument could be supplemented by material contained in our telegram Y146 of April 25† and your telegram 154 of May 18.† At this stage we do not see any particular merit in your eventually agreeing with the majority view if as you expect Indians and Poles agree on a more restricted interpretation. We will welcome your recommendations on this matter although it would seem to us further ventilation of the subject in the Commission would be easier if we stick to our guns in the Legal Committee.

6TH INTERIM REPORT — ARTICLES 16 AND 17

We very much hope it has been or will be possible for you to obtain in Chapter V some brief but general reference to the efficacy of the control system.

2. In your informal conversations with Parthasarathi you might point out that the Commission's interim reports to date, in dealing with Articles 16 and 17, generally have dealt only with specific investigations and they have not discussed the control system as a whole. In as much as cooperation of the parties is paramount and as Chapter V of the draft 6th Interim Report seems to point up considerable difficulties with both sides, it would seem appropriate and desirable to include now some short observation on the effectiveness of the control system, possibly in a new paragraph at the end of the chapter. This reference might state that whatever procedures the Commission may devise and whatever checks the Commission's teams may make, proper fulfilment of the conditions in Articles 16 and 17 depends essentially on the good faith of the parties in abiding by the agreement and in cooperating with the Commission. Such a statement it seems to us would be the sort of peg we need in order to point up at a later date the facts of the limited effectiveness of the control system.

3. The suggestion in paragraph 4 of your message that an assessment of the control system might appropriately be incorporated into a special report on the responses of the parties remains therefore a second choice. We pointed out in our telegram YY98 of July 25† that we would not wish to see the Commission commit itself in advance to submitting in the near future a special report on the cooperation of the parties. Moreover, as we understand it, this report will deal primarily with the general aspects of cooperation since May 1956.

4. We realize that negotiations in Hanoi on the 6th Interim Report may have passed the stage where further amendments to Chapter V may be made. If Chapter V has not yet been approved you should take a firm stand on this matter pointing out that the responsibilities of the Commission for the supervision of the Agreement on Vietnam would seem to require sooner or later, and preferably now, general comments about if not an assessment of the effectiveness of the control system.[38]

INCIDENTS INVOLVING COMMISSION TEAMS

Mobile Team 103, the first 14(c) Team of the Commission to start an investigation in the South for more than a year, got off to an inauspicious start September 11. The team, accompanied by two PAVN liaison officers, met three large demonstrations on its way to one of the areas of investigation. On their arrival at Tra Kieu (about 30 kilometres south-west of Tourane), they were treated to a large and prolonged demonstration at the office of the district chief. PAVN liaison officers were mauled but none of the demonstrations were directed against the Commission teams or any delegation. Many of demonstrators had complaints against PAVN and several thousand petitions were submitted to the team at various places. Team reported that demonstrations appeared to be organized. Although South Vietnamese liaison officer could guarantee security of team if it were unaccompanied by PAVN liaison officers, he stated he would require until September 17 to strengthen security arrangements in the event that the PAVN liaison officers went along.

For the final text of the Sixth Interim Report, see United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmnd. 31, Sixth Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Viet-Nam, 11 December, 1955 to 31 July, 1956, London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1957.

2. Yesterday morning the Commission decided to convey to Colonel Nam Commission's great concern about the incidents involving Team 103. Commission's Saigon representatives were to inform Nam that Commission not satisfied with security arrangements. Nam was to be requested to direct provincial and district authorities to make adequate security arrangements and to give full protection to the team and PAVN liaison officers. Commission considered incidents to be a hindrance to activities of the team and that action should be taken against local authorities who failed to give full protection and against persons who assaulted PAVN liaison officers. We were informed by Gauvin that President Diem had been informed of incident on night of September 11. He gave instructions that Government delegate for Central Vietnam should proceed to Tourane immediately. Nam sent one of his officers to the area and the team has reported that this officer arrived the morning of September 12. The team also reported that the mayor of Tourane, as a representative of the South Vietnamese Government, called on team yesterday afternoon and expressed regrets and apologies to both the teams and the PAVN liaison officers for the incident. He stated that investigation had been ordered and that those found guilty would be punished.

3. All this action was taken by the Central Government of South Vietnam before being approached by the Commission. Nam claimed to be puzzled by the incident, since there were security guards for the team and since local authorities had been advised to offer full security to the team.

4. Last night, just as were breathing more easily about this situation, we received word that the mobile element of Fixed Team Nha Trang while on a control trip yesterday to the Northern border of its zone of action was surrounded for hour and a half at (Tuyehor?) by a crowd of about 200 people who had gathered in front of the local police station. Stones were thrown at the team and team members suffered minor injuries. The crowd did not single out members of any particular delegation. The team was finally escorted out of its predicament by security police.

5. I have discussed the whole situation with Parthasarathi, who is very concerned about the incidents and about the implications of them. He contends that, even though the Southern Government may not be directly responsible for the incidents, its policies have contributed to them. On the one hand, Government Ministers tell the Commission that they think the Commission is a good thing and that they will (work?) with it, and on the other hand propaganda organs of the Government roundly condemn the Geneva Agreements and, by implication, the Commission which is here to supervise their implementation. As Parthasarathi says, the average Asian is not sophisticated enough to differentiate between the Geneva Agreements and the Commission. If he is led to hate one, his lack of discrimination will cause him to hate the other. Parthasarathi seems to feel that the issue should be put squarely to the South Vietnamese Government: either they want the Commission to stay or they do not. If they think the Commission's presence does serve their purpose, then they should call off the dogs to ensure the prestige and safety of the Commission and its agencies.

6. It is very difficult to apportion blame on these cases. The South is expected to provide adequate security for Commission teams, but few of us are competent to judge the adequacy of security arrangements before they are proven inadequate. The area in which

Mobile Team 103 has had its trouble is an old stronghold of the extreme right wing Dai Viet party. The Nha Trang Team had its trouble in an area which was strongly Viet Minh. In either case the incidents could have been designed to embarrass the Central Government. On the other hand one can argue that they were instigated by the Central Government itself or perhaps by one ministry, although it is difficult to see what could be gained by these tactics.

7. The problem undoubtedly will be thoroughly discussed with the (group corrupt) authorities when the Commission goes to Saigon. In the meantime Parthasarathi has indicated that we will refuse to send out Mobile Team 93. I believe he is justified in this since in the present circumstances, responsibility for the injury to any team members would devolve on the Commission.

8. Essential we go to the South but Parthasarathi will not go until we have approved a message to the Co-Chairmen.

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

REDEPLOYMENT OF MOBILE TEAM AT PHUC HOA

You will recall that after the Commission had been frustrated twice by the Vietminh in its attempt to exercise continuous control at Phuc Hoa, our Delegation reported towards the end of last July that the Secretary General had requested the Delegations to appoint members to a new mobile team. This action followed on receipt of a PAVN letter which reiterated their usual arguments regarding the difference between mobile and fixed teams, but agreed to the deployment of another team at Phuc Hoa. At that time our Delegation put up three alternative courses of action. We could participate in a new team, we could refuse to supply a member on the grounds that control at Phuc Hoa was a farce, or we could refuse to supply a member until the PAVN assured the Commission that they would not again force a withdrawal. You indicated that you preferred the third course of action.

2. In telegram No. 220 of September 24† from our Acting Commissioner, he reports that the Chairman of the Commission has put this item on the agenda again and proposed that a new team be sent forthwith. Our Acting Commissioner demurred at this suggestion, pointing out that an assurance ought to be obtained first from the PAVN that the team would be able to remain at Phuc Hoa under the conditions requested by the Commission. The Indian Commissioner, while agreeing with the Canadian analysis of the situation, said that he could not agree with the proposed course of action. We therefore find ourselves in a minority position.

3. In considering what course of action we should pursue, I would point out that in some respects the situation has changed since last July. In the first place, the faults of the PAVN have been recognized by the Commission and explained fairly clearly in the 6th Interim Report. Secondly, we find ourselves in a minority position which has the appearance of indicating that the Canadian Delegation would be preventing a team from returning. It would probably be a little difficult for parties not directly connected with the Commission to understand such Canadian action. Thirdly, the Indians and the Poles have accepted lately situations in the South which they did not like but which we urged them to accept in order to avoid rocking the boat. It might appear to the Indians that we have one voice in the South and another in the North.

4. Perhaps the principal reason for not jarring the machinery of the International Commission at this time is that some progress is gradually being made in obtaining both a workable relationship with the authorities in the South and a better understanding between the authorities in the South and the Indians.

5. With regard to the responsibilities of the Commission for the supervision of the Cease Fire Agreement, the important question about which we have to decide is whether the occasion has arisen when we wish to tackle the problem of Canadian connivance with what is a farce. While this opportunity would appear to be perhaps as good a one as we will have to raise this fundamental problem, on balance I think that it would be preferable to agree to the redeployment of a team while maintaining as much as possible our own freedom of action. The plan of action outlined in the attached telegram I consider would permit us to go along with the Indians while at the same time preparing the way for this so-called supervision and control to be exposed for what it is.

6. In view of the above considerations I recommend, if you agree, that the instructions contained in the attached telegram be sent to our Acting Commissioner.

7. The copy of the telegram from our Acting Commissioner,† in which he recommends that a team be redeployed at Phuc Hoa, is also attached.

REDEPLOYMENT OF MOBILE TEAM AT PHUC HOA

We consider a return to Phuc Hoa without having obtained from the PAVN so much as a budge from the position exposed in their May 29 and July 19 letters to be unsatisfactory. Whatever the Commission may have said to the PAVN in the past and whatever we may put on the record, if the Commission returns to Phuc Hoa now it is doing so on the understanding that the period of activity will be discussed with the PAVN at a later date. Moreover in agreeing to the redeployment of a team we would contribute again to the illusion that control exists on the frontiers of North Vietnam with respect to possible imports of arms.

2. As you suggest our disagreement with the Indians and the Poles in this matter arises over the apparent procedural question of whether the PAVN should first give an assurance that the team will not be forced again to withdraw. In the full context of the problem of arms control in the North, this question is really the substantive one of whether effective control in the form of continuous control can be carried on as the Commission wishes. We agree that it might be difficult for third parties to catch the nuances and to understand that the Canadian delegation really would not be responsible for non-control if we refused to provide a member of the team.

3. In dealing with this question we are not concerned with showing faults of the Vietminh. That task has been accomplished. What we are really concerned about is our responsibility in carrying on the illusion of arms control and whether the present occasion is an appropriate one to tackle this fundamental problem. In view of the difficulties in explaining our position we reluctantly agree to a Canadian being appointed to the team.

4. When you indicate in the Commission our agreement to the redeployment of a team you should do so under protest pointing out that the Commission has its dignity and responsibilities and neither in our opinion are being safeguarded in going back without the PAVN having accepted the stated position of the Commission. The Commission must consider whether to participate in what to date must be recognized as ineffective control is to appear to give a clean bill of health when we have no proof it is deserved. It is a fact that certain conditions respecting the Commission's control are laid down in the CFA but that does not preclude the Commission frankly acknowledging the position in which it finds itself. You should also read into the record any considerations additional to those covered in paragraph 2 of your telegram 220 which you think useful to make. In this context we think it would be useful if you observed that the question is not one of effective control in Phuc Hoa but that it is the question of whether there is to be effective control throughout the North over possible imports of arms. One loophole negates the activities of all the other teams. Finally you should indicate that we expect that the Commission will obtain from the PAVN an assurance that irrespective of the time which a team may spend at Phuc Hoa it will not be expected to withdraw until the Commission so decides.

5. Before the Commission meeting please indicate informally to Parthasarathi that we are going to agree to the redeployment of a team, but reluctantly during your conversation please tell him that if there should be any more trouble at Phuc Hoa we will have to give serious consideration to raising the whole question of the inadequacies of arms control in the North in the frankest terms. The question may be raised some day on how effective the Commission has been and we must safeguard our position.

LETTER NO. 249 Saigon, October 18, 1956

CONFIDENTIAL

MOBILE TEAM 103

On October 12 the South Vietnamese Liaison Mission sent a letter† (copy attached for Ottawa only) to the Commission in which it questions the modalities of investigation of Team 103 on the grounds that they interfere with the sovereignty of the Republic of Vietnam. It draws attention to certain requests of the Commission for the production of documents such as "a list of all persons arrested since the Cease-Fire Agreement who are former Resistance workers, requests for justification of arrests, requests for information on the competency of civil servants, etc." The South Vietnamese Government consider these requests as interference in their own administration. Furthermore, they state that the request of the team to interrogate "anyone in any circumstances" constitutes another form of interference with the sovereignty of the Republic. It says that the Republic of Vietnam cannot tolerate that Viet Minh agents be given, through such elastic procedure, the opportunity of disguising themselves as witnesses to discredit the Government and that the population be lead, through such procedure, to believe that the International Commission is a supra-national judicial organization having the power to control the actions of the local administration and even of the Government for Central Vietnam. It states that the local authorities only are qualified to decide whether or not the team can proceed to certain villages to pursue its investigation. The letter ends by stating that the Vietnamese Liaison Mission is forced consequently to inform the International Commission that the Government of the Republic of Vietnam cannot give its agreement to the process of investigation envisaged by Mobile Team 103. In other words, the South Vietnamese Government raised the question of principle as to whether the team is to carry out its investigation in accordance with the instructions of the Commission or within the restrictions established by the South Vietnamese Government.

2. Faced with this issue, Mr. Parthasarathi decided during an interview with President Diem, to explain to him that unless the South Vietnamese agreed to let the team operate in accordance with the instructions of the Commission, the Commission would be forced to withdraw the team. Mr. Parthasarathi gained the impression from his interview that the President would give instructions to the effect that the Team should be allowed to carry out its investigations in accordance with its own instructions. That was on October 13. The next day the three Commissioners met with Colonel Nam who reiterated the position of his Government as stated in their letter of October 12. Mr. Parthasarathi explained to Colonel Nam (who appeared to have certain misconceptions as to how the team would carry out its investigation), that he agreed with the South Vietnamese that certain requests of the team such as the production of a "list of all the persons arrested since the Cease-Fire Agreement who were formerly Resistance workers" were not legitimate requests. He said he would give instructions to the team to the effect that only village documents such as census register, register of inhabitants, property register, register of births, marriages and deaths, or other documents relevant to the examination of a point at issue should be requested by the team. He also assured Colonel Nam that all witnesses would be questioned in camera, but that it was essential that the team be allowed to proceed to the villages if it were to carry out its investigation "on the spot". Mr. Parthasarathi added that he would give Colonel Nam a copy of the instructions he proposed to send to the team. These instructions were drafted the same day, shown to us, and after a few amendments, were agreed to. A copy such as the one attached† was given to Colonel Nam. Before he left for Hanoi on October 15, Mr. Parthasarathi told Colonel Nam that he should try to avoid raising objections to the team's present instructions which were considered by the Commission to be the minimum requirement for the team to carry out its investigation properly; otherwise, the team would have to be recalled.

3. During the last three days, at the request of Mr. Williams, I have been in contact with Colonel Nam to press him to give his agreement to the team's instructions and to instruct the local authorities to co-operate with the team within the limits of these instructions. I regret to inform you that up to now the position of the South Vietnamese Government as stated in its letter of October 12 has not changed an iota. They still claim that it is their right to decide whether or not the team can proceed to the villages. They are using, amongst other arguments, the lack of security in the area, and claim that only a large number of troops, (which they are unable to put at the disposal of the team) could prevent unfortunate incidents. The South Vietnamese Government, however, declares itself prepared to co-operate with the Commission if the Commission will limit its investigation to visiting the Vinh Trinh Dam (which it has done already) where the alleged massacre is said to have occurred and to questioning the witnesses listed by the PAVN and those listed by the South Vietnamese Government at a place such as Faifo or Tourane.

4. The South Vietnamese Government does not appear to fear very much the investigation of the incidents which occurred in the Duy Xuyen area. They claim that these incidents were perpetrated by dissident forces or were a settlement of accounts between Viet Minh agents and other dissident forces. What they fear is the presence of the Commission in certain villages which are still under the influence of Viet Minh agents. It would be a serious loss of prestige for the Southern Government to be faced with a situation where the population of certain villages at the instigation of Viet Minh agents would protest to the Commission against the Government. There is the main objection of the South to letting the team proceed to the villages. Instead of using obstructionist measures which are a "couteau à deux tranchants" the South would like the Commission to be realistic and to take account of Viet Minh subversive activities in the South. In addition, we might as well recognize it, the South has little faith in the impartiality of the Indians. No amount of argument will make them change their opinion. As I said before, the only way the South will agree to the investigation is if it is limited to the questioning of witnesses listed by the PAVN and the witnesses listed by the South Government, and if the investigation is conducted at Faifo or Tourane. They will not allow the team to carry out its investigation in all the villages where it wishes to go. They have the serious task of establishing law and order in an area which is infested with Viet Minh agents and they will not let anything interfere with the success of this task.

5. I warned Colonel Nam, however, that if the South Vietnamese Government were to continue to object as a matter of principle to the team proceeding to the villages, instead of attaining the same goal through other means, we might be unsuccessful in preventing the Commission's decision to withdraw the team. It is evident from my talks with Colonel Nam that the South is prepared to take the risk, but it is anxious that we do everything in our power to try to influence our colleagues in the Commission to agree to limiting the investigation to the questioning of the witnesses of both sides at Faifo or Tourane.

6. This case illustrates clearly that 14(c) cases are becoming a serious source of irritation for the South and may endanger the present structure of the Commission. I have been told by Colonel Nam that the South is now preparing a letter to be Commission in which it will question the present use of Article 14(c) which, in their opinion, has not only been abused by the North but has become a means of propaganda against the South, a situation which the South cannot tolerate any longer. We may, therefore, be faced with a new crisis and the Commission will have to bring the matter to the attention of the Co-Chairmen. In a way, the proposed action of the South Vietnamese is probably a desirable thing. There is little doubt that 14(c) cases are becoming a farce. The moment a man is arrested in the South, Viet Minh agents report to the North and an allegation against the South is sent to the Commission. The North provides the facts, i.e., the name of the individual, the date and place of his arrest, that he has been arrested because he is a former Resistance worker and therefore a 14(c) case. Faced with such evidence, the Commission considers that there is a prima facie case and it asks the South for comments. While these allegations are seldom proved, the damage is done. As Voltaire said, "Mentez, mentez, il en restera toujours quelque chose". The beauty of the process for the North is that the onus is put on the South to disprove the allegation. The Vietnamese Liaison Mission is pestered with requests for comments from the Commission and innumerable reminders. In order for the South to satisfy the Commission that the person arrested is not a 14(c) case, it has to produce court documents; in other words, it has to justify itself for the arrest of an individual who has committed any ordinary offence under the common law and which does not concern the Commission. It requires considerable time and is not an easy task in a country such as South Vietnam with poor communications and a recent history of internal disturbances. There is also the case of people who are Viet Minh agents and who are working against the Government. These people are not always arrested for a specific action against the Government, but as security risks. Unless the Commission takes into consideration the special circumstances existing in South Vietnam where subversive agents are operating under instructions from the North, there will be no end to the problem. Where the Indians fail to be impartial and objective is when they refuse to acknowledge the difference between the régime in the North and that in the South. One is a régime which controls entirely the population through its police system, while the other suffers from all the inefficiency and encumbrances of a free society. One can use any means to obstruct the investigation of the Commission, to play the game successfully. The other is, due to its political system, unable to use these means. For the above reasons it is probably desirable that the South raise the whole issue and that the matter be brought to the attention of the Co-Chairmen.

VALUE OF RETAINING INTERNATIONAL COMMISSIONS IN INDOCHINA

You will recall that in a departmental memo of August 3 to the minister reference was made to a message from the Australian Minister in Saigon to Canberra and conversations he had had with Sebald of the Bureau of Far Eastern Affairs and Reinhardt concerning the usefulness of the International Commission in Vietnam. Sebald had indicated that he was not at all convinced that the continuing presence of the International Commission was a good thing. Reinhardt had said it was his view that the Commission should stay on until the beginning of 1957. In view of these reports indicating a sceptical attitude among some USA officials, you will recall that before the departure for South East Asia of Mr. Allen Dulles, Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, I reported by phone to the Department that I had told him that we would welcome on his return his personal assessment of the value of retaining the Commissions in Indochina. Allen Dulles had said that he would be very glad to do this.

2. Since Allen Dulles' return, there have been two opportunities of informal conversations with him. The first was on October 16 on the occasion of Glazebrook's leave taking and Rae's arrival. Allen Dulles was fresh from the Indochina scene and had spend some time in South Vietnam and Cambodia, although he did not apparently visit Laos, as reported from Delhi (see Delhi Despatch 1402 September 17†), "since delicate negotiations were going on there, and his visit might have been misinterpreted". Mr. Dulles took the initiative in stating that in his view the Commissions were doing a valuable job, and despite the difficulties and frustrations for the Canadians, of which he was aware, the work should continue. He was aware in particular of the drain on our manpower. Since two of the senior members of the CIA staff had visited Saigon at the end of 1954 and had reported on the precarious position of the administration in South Vietnam, his recent visit had enabled him to confirm the substantial progress which had been made towards strengthening the position in the South and reaching a point of comparative stability.

3. I had the opportunity of a personal chat with Allen Dulles last Saturday evening, the 20th, at the Italian Embassy. Later I expect to have a longer talk with him but meantime I think you should know that his general conclusion is that the Commissions are discharging an important and useful function. Although his comment had a particular reference to the situation in Laos, which he regards as critical, he said that in his opinion the Commission's presence remained valuable in Vietnam, and Cambodia also, although the Cambodian situation was different and it might be that the same criteria did not apply. At any rate, there was no doubt in his mind as to Laos. The Laotian situation was closely connected with that in Vietnam because of the Vietminh connection with the Pathet Lao.

4. Allen Dulles reminded me that this was to be taken as a personal opinion only, that he had not yet discussed this matter with the State Department and that he therefore wished us to regard his view as entirely personal and confidential.

5. So far as State Department views are concerned, you may be interested incidentally to know that on two occasions in the last three weeks in the course of informal conversations an officer of this Embassy has had with Kattenburg on the Vietnam desk, the latter said that if we were to ask for State Department views concerning the value of the International Commission in Vietnam, the answer would probably be that the Vietnam Commission is regarded as useful and should if possible be kept in being for the present. These remarks were made in connection with the possible Commission discussion of MAAG, and the rider was added that, if the Commission should attempt "to legislate MAAG out of existence", these State Department views on the value of the Vietnam Commission would have to be reexamined.

6. You will be glad to know that Allen Dulles spoke in the highest terms of our High Commissioner in Delhi, Escott Reid, with whom he had talked at some length (see Reid's despatch 1402 September 17†).

VALUE OF RETAINING INTERNATIONAL COMMISSIONS IN INDOCHINA

In my reply (October 27) to Holmes' personal and confidential letter to me of October 23,† I mentioned Allen Dulles' suggestion that I seek the current view of Walter Robertson, Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs. This I had an opportunity of doing after dinner last evening.

2. Stripped to the bone, Robertson's expressed opinion was that the Commission in Vietnam still performed an important and useful function, that the Cambodia Commission could be liquidated at any time without significant results, good or bad, and that in Laos it was very difficult to assess the value of the Commission's presence. With respect to Laos, Robertson said that he would be prepared to accept the judgement of the Canadian member as being in a better position to weigh the pros and cons than anybody else.

3. Robertson spoke in the familiar critical strain of the activities of the Indian members of the Commissions, dismissed the Poles as in all respects Communist agents and praised the work of the Canadians. With regard to Laos, he was convinced that Pathet Lao remained what it had always been, an agency of Vietminh, that the Communists were planning a "take over" of the Government. The Indians were playing the Communist game. It remained to be seen whether the Royal Government could stand against this constant pressure and manoeuvre. In these circumstances it was difficult to assess the role of the International Commission. Bridle, for whom Robertson expressed admiration and respect, could give the best judgement and the USA authorities would accept his as the best informed opinion.[40]

Le commissaire de la Commission internationale de surveillance pour le Vietnam au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Commissioner, International Supervisory Commission for Vietnam, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET. CANADIAN EYES ONLY.

Reference: My Memorandum of June 14, 1956 to Mr. J.W. Holmes.

CANADIAN POLICY ON THE COMMISSION

Nearly five months have passed since the memorandum under reference was written. At that time we were concerned with maintaining the Commission in operation and with the action which South Vietnam would have to take within the context of the Cease-Fire Agreement in order to meet the price which seemed to be demanded by the Indians for continued participation in the Commission. The Commission is still functioning and at the moment it seems unlikely that it will break up in the near future. This is due to more than one circumstance: during July and August South Vietnam began to provide "practical co-operation" to the Commission, and for a time it appeared that this co-operation would be substantial. The Co-Chairmen so far have raised no objections about the arrangements which were worked out between the French and the South Vietnamese. The Indians appear to have softened their legalistic approach to the problem and we infer from their behaviour that they are willing, if not anxious, to see the Commission remain in operation. The attitude of the PAVN is hard to fathom, but General Giap's letter of August 21 questioned the basis of the new arrangements, and caused the Commission to seek guidance from the Co-Chairmen. We are, therefore, left with a situation in which no one seems inclined to bring the Commission to an end, although, ironically, the only legal party left — the PAVN High Command — probably is less enthusiastic about continuation of the Commission than is anyone else. It is probably safe to say that all interested parties, including the Commission powers, are fed up, but are not anxious to destroy the cease-fire structure.

2. At present, the Commission's time is taken up by three aspects of the Cease-Fire Agreement:

(a) The Commission continues to be concerned with the Demilitarized Zone and the Demarcation Line. Both parties regularly make complaints about incidents on the opposite side of the Line and the Commission investigates these charges. At the same time the Commission concerns itself with the administrative arrangements in the Demilitarized Zone and is working with the parties to find arrangements which are consistent both with the requirements of the parties and with the provisions of the Cease-Fire Agreement itself; the main concern at the moment is to maintain order in the Demilitarized Zones on both sides of the Line and to ensure that authorized persons are able to move freely across the Line in accordance with the provisions of the Agreement. The problem is complicated[41] by the PAVN's apparent reluctance to participate in the Joint Commission under the new arrangements (see my telegram No. 346 of October 22†).

[40] Pour la réponse à ce télégramme, voir le document 723.
For the response to this telegram, see Document 723.

(b) Article 14(c) continues to absorb a disproportionate amount of the Commission's time. Most 14(c) complaints come from the PAVN, and in our opinion this Article has converted the Commission into a propaganda organ for the North. The South, in its efforts to weed out Communist agents, and thus to ensure the security of the State, arrests and harasses "former resistance workers". The standards of evidence are so low that a high proportion of the arrests made by the South turn into 14(c) cases; the South by not replying to Commission letters lends credence to these charges. Over a period of time the situation is created on paper which leads the casual onlooker to believe that the South possesses one of the most oppressive régimes ever created. Through inaction, the Commission has made it impossible for the South to balance the record by making charges about PAVN subversion and sabotage, and there is no indication now that the record will be made any less one-sided. (The present position of the Legal Committee's report on espionage, sabotage and subversion is described in a letter† being sent to you today.)

(c) Articles 16, 17 and 19 are also being used with good effect by the PAVN. Commission control in South Vietnam is effective enough, and international traffic is heavy enough, to result in innumerable petty violations of Commission procedure and of the Agreement, as well as a few major violations. The lack of effective control in the North, however, has enabled the PAVN, by one single, all-embracing act of denial of Articles 16 and 17, to avoid any violations.[42] In present circumstances, we have no reason to believe that the situation will improve. The PAVN, the Poles and the Indians all are inclined to apply pressure on the United States and to criticize U.S. operations in South Vietnam. Each has its own motives: The PAVN is always seeking methods of discrediting the Diem government, and in addition probably is genuinely afraid of a military build-up in the South. The Poles are undoubtedly acting under orders from Moscow and furthering the general Soviet-bloc aim of discrediting and undercutting U.S. influence wherever it is encountered. The Indian attitude, although less easily analyzed, probably is influenced by their belief that United States influence in Southeast Asia is a new form of colonialism.

It is highly unlikely that the South will be allowed to import military equipment to replace that exported by the French; indeed, if we read the handwriting on the wall correctly, it will be very difficult for them to establish any form of import credit. We doubt if there is any way to legalize any import of war material from the U.S.[43] We may as well accept this fact, and decide how far we are prepared to dissociate ourselves from U.S. action along these lines.

Article 19 also will become more embarrassing for the South, since the Commission is coming closer and closer to a full-scale inquiry into U.S. military assistance and the question of a de facto military alliance. Until now, the strongest efforts this Delegation have been able to make have done little more than slow the pace.

3. Therefore, although our primary goal of maintaining the Commission has been realized, the virtues of this goal are becoming less obvious as time passes.[44] In my memorandum I guessed that cooperation provided by the South would be too little and too late. After an initial spurt of cooperation, the South have lived up to our guess. They are about to question the applicability of 14(c); they have become intransigent on the question of mobile teams and they more and more tend to argue their cases in terms of national sovereignty, and not in terms of cooperation with the Commission. All this could lead to another Commission crisis, and a special report to the Co-Chairmen which would be based[45] on the lack of cooperation shown by the South. Needless to say, this would provide the PAVN and the Poles with a new batch of propaganda, and would give the Indians an excuse for leaving the Commission and throwing the blame on the South for destroying the cease-fire structure.[46] The Canadian Delegation is not under the illusion that the PAVN is providing any more cooperation than is South Vietnam; however the PAVN are cleverer in evading Commission demands. Their security system is efficient enough to prevent any information leaking out, and the nature of the country is such as to make evasion of control under Articles 16 and 17 a fairly simple matter. It seems increasingly apparent in addition, that the Indians have a tendency to cushion any blow which might fall on the PAVN; this tendency is not a result of sympathy for Communism, but certainly stems partly from the Indian feeling that the lack of nation-wide elections has deprived the PAVN of something which was theirs. I also suspect that the Indians lean emotionally towards the North, and that until recently anyway, they bracketed Diem with Syngman Rhee and Chiang Kai-shek.

4. The net result of all this is a steady blackening of the South in Commission records; the Commission more and more becomes a propaganda weapon with which the PAVN beat the Government of South Vietnam and the role of the Commission as an international judge and arbiter becomes more of a farce every day.[47] A few months ago the Canadian Delegation was caught between two opposing forces — the Indians who laid down certain conditions for their continued participation in the Commission, and the South Vietnamese who would not give enough cooperation to meet the Indian conditions. Once again we find ourselves caught between two forces, but this time not in the context of maintaining the Commission, but primarily because of our desire to produce a balanced record. We agree with your desire not to be blind advocates of the South, but it is distasteful to be completely impartial and thereby watch the record being shaped into an anti-South Vietnamese and anti-United States propaganda weapon.

5. The South, therefore, is being painted as the offending party, and under present arrangements there is little we can do to prevent this one-sided case from being built up.[48] We should take some action, and there are a number of courses open to us. We could withdraw from the Commission, and by doing so, bring it to an end. We could try to have the Agreement re-written in more realistic terms.[49] Finally, we could continue on under existing arrangements, while trying more positively to redress the balance.

6. There are a number of difficulties involved in our taking the initiative in breaking up the Commission. To take the initiative, we would have to have an argument which would justify our action to world opinion; while on the surface it appears that we have a case against the North, we find, when we put it down on paper in factual terms, that it is not as convincing as we would like. We must face the unpleasant fact that much of the lack of control in North Vietnam is the fault of the Commission itself and, by association, of the Canadian Delegation. In addition, any case we could make against the North would be pretty effectively counter-balanced by the case which the Indians and the Poles could make against the South.[50]

7. Tactically, our strongest[51] approach probably would be through a unilateral decision to withdraw from the Commission on, say, 30 days' notice. We could refer to the statement of July 28, 1954, in which the Canadian Government said that it believed "the Commissions have a reasonable chance of operating effectively ...." and added that "if our expectations unfortunately prove ill-founded, and the Commissions are frustrated by obstruction, then, of course, no useful purpose would be served by continuing their existence." However, although this would give us the propaganda initiative, it would antagonize the Indians. We therefore would have to avoid unilateral action, and yet if we consulted the Indians first we might find our action turned against us. South Vietnam, on the other hand, may decide to ask the Commission to leave. Especially if it continues to feel it is being persecuted by the Indian-Polish majority. If it does contemplate action such as this, its position would be strengthened if it timed its move to coincide with the release of a biased interim report which contained a strong Canadian minority. Canada conceivably might not discourage such drastic action by South Vietnam (and the United States); indeed, at some time we might welcome such a move, provided we were given enough time to make the necessary minority report.

8. The appraisal of the military strength of South Vietnam which was sent to you with our Despatch No. 471 of October 31† painted a discouraging picture, and since the appraisal was written, we have become even more pessimistic. We must admit that no one knows what deterrent force the Commission possesses but we must take into account the possibility that the withdrawal of the Commission would upset the balance in Vietnam and endanger the security of the South. For this reason, as well as for the reasons outlined above, any attempt on our part to break up the Commission would have very serious implications, and would require very careful consideration.

9. The final difficulty involved in breaking up the Commission is the fact that, confronted with crises in the Middle East and in Eastern Europe, few countries would be very happy if we started rocking the boat in Vietnam.

10. The second most drastic action which we could take would be to press for a revision of the Cease-Fire Agreement. This would have a number of advantages: It probably would give us an opportunity to reduce our commitments in Vietnam, and it would cut out a lot of the deadwood in the present Agreement. Such a revision, however, would require agreement by both North and South Vietnam and might entail a new Geneva conference with all the horse-trading this would involve. At the present time I suspect it would be extremely difficult to arrange.

11. If we cannot withdraw from the Commission, and if we cannot get the Commission's terms of reference revised, then I suppose we must resign ourselves to staying here and trying to redress the balance between the PAVN and South Vietnam. If things go on the way they have been in the past two months, we have little hope of maintaining a balance or of shaping the record.[52] Every day we are faced with the difficulty of proving anything against the PAVN, and as long as circumstances remain the same I think that the criticisms found in the Sixth Interim Report represent the summit of our efforts in this respect. We try to cushion the blows against the South, but even with the best cases we have difficulty in carrying our arguments against the Indians and Poles. Added to this is the apparent unwillingness of South Vietnam to go beyond a certain point in its cooperation with the Commission; probably it is at least willing to have the Commission hang around and guarantee the 17th Parallel, but it wants to get this protection as cheaply as possible. (In this connection you will be interested in Saigon letter No. 265 of November 1, which is attached as Appendix "B".† Although I do not agree with all of Mr. Gauvin's comments, it is useful to have the impressions of someone who has associated with the South Vietnamese officials for nearly a year.) The South has made it quite clear that it will not accept meddling by a supra-national agency in its internal affairs, and it is equally clear that neither South Vietnam nor the United States intend to let the Commission interfere with the military build-up of the country. The United States philosophy of "the spirit of Articles 16 and 17" has our sympathy, but we are only one member of the Commission and the other two Delegations (and the PAVN) show more interest in literal interpretation of the Agreement than in metaphysical analysis.

12. I should therefore like to reiterate that as long as circumstances remain as they are, our continued participation in the Commission can only result in continuing harsh criticism of the South and a resultant propaganda victory for the North.[53]

13. If we are to remain in Vietnam it seems clear that we must do something to change the circumstances and the policy under which we work. Our whole approach prevents us from becoming blind advocates of the South; we would find it difficult to live with ourselves if we become as partial as the Poles. We may as well face the fact that the United States and South Vietnam will continue to cooperate in the defence field, and thereby provide more raw material for the PAVN propaganda machine. Our only positive policy, therefore, can be to soften the attack wherever possible and to agree with the majority when clear-cut violations of the Agreement are found. It will do us no good to defend impossible cases, and both South Vietnam and the United States should be told this. We have been giving the South some advice on how to avoid censure in the day-to-day operations of the Commission; in matters such as these we are not giving up impartiality but are simply encouraging a party to give more cooperation to the Commission.

[53] Note marginale :/Marginal Note:
It is not really our participation as such, but the facts of life of the Commission [A.R. Menzies]

14. We shall, of course, continue to press for Commission action against the PAVN wherever there are grounds for this.[54] Our resources, however, are being drained away steadily,[55] and it will be increasingly difficult for us to accomplish anything in this field unless there are some well-founded allegations against the PAVN. We could provide the South Vietnamese with the raw material for a few such allegations but in our opinion this is a dangerous and undesirable course. We would prefer that the allegations, particularly under Articles 16 and 17, be coordinated between the United States and South Vietnam. Surely there is intelligence material available which, by judicious revision, could be used to bring pressure to bear against the PAVN. I think it would be useful if this question could be discussed with the State Department with a view to working out some procedure which would keep us from coming into direct contact with the South Vietnamese and which would make the United States officials in Saigon the guiding force behind a campaign of well-founded allegations. This would provide the ammunition which we require. (Appendix "A"† contains Mr. Bauer's estimate of the job confronting us during the next few months if we are to obtain any balance at all in the Seventh Interim Report. There are only three headings under which South Vietnamese allegations are required, but these involve key subjects.)

15. The problem is an urgent one. Eventually we will be faced with the Seventh Interim Report and before this, I suspect that the Indians and the Poles will attempt some special report on cooperation. Any general report on cooperation or control would work against the South at this time.

obtain advice from Department, and meanwhile you should offer Nam no, repeat no, advice as to course of action he should follow. If UK Embassy wishes to draw conclusions from following info and advise Nam on basis of it, that is up to them, but Canadian delegation should stay clear of question, at least for now.

2. Parthasarathi could give no repeat no opinion about what Delhi's reaction would be if South Vietnam were to tell Commission it would no repeat no longer entertain 14(c) enquiries. However, a statement like this from the South would not repeat not surprise him. He would favour passing it on to the Co-Chairmen, and asking them what to do. Commission would not repeat not necessarily suspend operations while waiting for reply.

3. I have impression Parthasarathi personally would welcome a move like this, but only as a means of bringing the realities of the situation out into the open; the South is dragging its feet on 14(c) and a blanket refusal would force the issue and get us away from the frustrating delaying game which is now being played.

4. As Parthasarathi asked, how far can the Commission (and the Co-Chairmen) go, while still retaining their self respect? They have compromised on the question of a responsible party; they have compromised on the legal basis of the cease-fire; the South's refusal to cooperate on 14(c) would mean that the very terms of the agreement were being set aside. Could the Commission proper and the Co-Chairmen swallow this too?

5. It is difficult to assess the PAVN's present attitude towards the Commission. Undoubtedly a refusal by the South to cooperate in 14(c) would result in harsh words or possibly even a harsh line in the North.

6. I do not repeat not think anyone is interested in having the Vietnam boat rocked at this time, and the South's proposed course of action could rock it; it might even result in capsizing. We can understand the South's position, but in present circumstances we cannot avoid feeling that a move now would have unpredictable, but probably undesirable, results. A delay of a few weeks would not weaken their position appreciably, but probably would make it easier for everyone concerned.

7. (Nam's earlier 14(c) memo is in the Commission mill now, and some decision should be taken in the next fortnight).

8. We realize that the South is becoming impatient with the Commission; however, the Commission is capable of the same feeling.

SOUTH VIETNAM AND ARTICLE 14(C)

It seems to us that there are three principal considerations in determining our policy on this matter. First, whether Article 14(c) investigations serve any useful purpose. Second, any action by the South should not place Diem's Government in a bad light. Third, we ourselves should not become involved or appear to be in the position of concerting with the South on their reported initiative.

2. We do not believe that any positive contribution which the Commission may make to the maintenance of the status quo in Vietnam can be considered as arising from Commission activities under Article 14(c). We would therefore welcome a cessation of these activities and any consequent reduction in our commitment in Vietnam, although we would not wish to counsel the South to take the action which they contemplate.

3. If there is to be any reduction in the Commission's activities someone must take the initiative and the abandonment of 14(c) investigations and correspondence might be a useful first step. It would be important though, that any action by the South should not be such that it would simply reflect a negative attitude towards the Commission and a refusal to cooperate.

4. Before giving any firm opinion about the action which the South Vietnamese authorities propose to take, we would wish to know the precise terms of their communication. However, it seems to us that, until the Commission has discovered on the basis of its investigations that complaints from the North are largely propaganda, the South will be on relatively weak grounds in arguing that 14(c) investigations should no longer be initiated.

5. Perhaps the grounds which we would find easiest to defend and on which the South could argue that 14(c) investigations should be terminated would be along the following lines. The Geneva Agreements when originally drawn up foresaw an uncertain political situation continuing in Vietnam in the immediate post-armistice period. It was important that during this period the political rights of the people should be safeguarded. The situation now has changed inasmuch as the political situation has stabilized and national elections apparently will not be held in the foreseeable future. Moreover, civil authority and government administration have been re-established throughout the South and the people now have the benefit of recourse to the normal procedures of the law. In these circumstances an indefinite continuation of investigations by the International Commission with their consequent burden on the civil authorities would not appear to be reasonable. The authorities in the South therefore trust that the Commission will review its position on this matter and that further requests for investigations under Article 14(c) will not be submitted. At the same time, the authorities in the South do not propose to make any further complaints about the suppression of democratic liberties in North Vietnam.

6. In our previous paragraph we have endeavoured to put an argument for termination of Article 14(c) investigations more or less on a basis of principle. We appreciate that the South have a good many other arguments based on particular aspects of the situation, e.g. the presence of Viet Minh agents who prevent objective findings by the teams.

7. We agree with your advice to our Saigon office to counsel delay on the part of the authorities in the South in transmitting to the Commission the communication which they have under consideration. You might indicate informally to the South authorities that we are not in principle opposed to their intention. We would like to have more information about both its form and the timing of their approach to the International Commission.

8. As an initiative of this kind on the part of the South would have to be carefully contained and directed along what we would consider to be a useful channel, we are approaching the U.K. High Commissioner's Office in order that there may be a full understanding of our respective positions and so that we may, if necessary, act in concert in providing comments to the Southern authorities.

9. If you see no objection please arrange for our Saigon office to inform the authorities in the South about our initial reaction (without mentioning our approach to the U.K.) and forward if possible more detailed information about the nature of the communication to the Commission which is under consideration in Saigon.

SOUTH VIETNAM AND 14(C)

Your telegram under reference arrived just as Gauvin and I were on our way to call on Foreign Minister. I arrived in Saigon yesterday afternoon and shortly after my arrival Gauvin and I had an hour with Stephenson who wanted to discuss 14(c) with me. In my presence Stephenson drafted a telegram to the Foreign Office in which he indicated that he would try to encourage the South Vietnamese to delay taking any action until Parthasarathi arrives in Saigon on November 24. It seemed to me that there was considerable merit in South Vietnam trying to carry Parthasarathi with them in their determination to get out from under 14(c). It was my view, which Stephenson supported, that it would be useful for Parthasarathi to have informal conversations with the South about this matter and, indeed, for Stephenson himself to talk it over with Parthasarathi. Stephenson asked me when I called upon Mau today to suggest to the Foreign Minister that he await the arrival of Parthasarathi.

2. When we saw Mau this afternoon I conveyed informally the views contained in paragraph 7 of your telegram under reference. Mau asked me to thank you for your comprehension and understanding of the position of his Government. He assured me that he would not repeat not take precipitate action. He plans to give us a copy of his draft letter. He was also receptive to the idea that there would be merit in discussing the issue informally with Parthasarathi.

3. With our Saigon letter 265 of November 16,† which should reach you next week, we sent you a copy of a letter dated November 10† from Gauvin to me in which he filled me in on some of the background negotiations between Colonel Nam, Stephenson and himself with respect to a letter about 14(c) which Nam very nearly sent to the Commission.

4. Stephenson in his telegram to the Foreign Office yesterday emphasized that it was likely the Commission would send any communication from the South about 14(c) to the Co-Chairmen, and the crucial consideration was the form in which this would be done. If we could be sure that the Commissions would simply refer the South's letter without any comments there would be no repeat no major difficulties. It has not repeat not been our experience, however, that the Commission is inclined to send communications to the Co-Chairmen without at the same time muddying the waters.

5. For the moment there is little more that we can do. We shall of course keep you informed. Though I do not repeat not intend in this communication to comment on the line of approach which you set forth in paragraph five of your telegram under reference, I am not repeat not certain that I understand fully the implications of the penultimate sentence of this paragraph.

It seems that the best method of getting South Vietnam to do something is for us to advise them not repeat not to do it. Colonel Nam called on me this morning and delivered a letter dated November 17 which he said he had delivered earlier this morning to the other delegations about South Vietnam's attitude to 14(c). The substantive part of the letter reads: "The Government of the Republic of Vietnam will no repeat no longer from this day on entertain complaints under Article 14(c)."

2. Nam, in justification of this sudden action, said that before I had spoken to Mau, the latter had again thought over this question and had realized that it would be better to send the letter immediately to Parthasarathi so that he would handle the problem rather than his successor. Mau apparently believes that Parthasarathi will be more understanding of their position. Further, according to Nam, the South believes that if it waits until Parthasarathi comes here on November 24 he might counsel amending the letter or not repeat not signing it at all, and this would embarrass the South since its decision is final.

3. Though it is difficult to forecast the effect that this letter will have on the Commission, past experience leads us to believe that we are about to enter another period of soul searching. Our colleagues on the Commission may conclude that the South have gone too far. I am personally somewhat embarrassed by the timing of the South's action. I fear that my colleagues may establish in their minds a cause and effect relationship between my presence here and the issuance of the letter.

4. Our immediately following telegram† contains a brief summary of the South's letter.

SOUTH VIETNAMESE LETTER RE 14(C)

Our preliminary reaction to the text of the South Vietnamese letter is that it does provide a not repeat not unreasonable basis for questioning the activities of the Commission under Article 14(c). We are also pleased to note that the letter does not repeat not reject the principles enunciated in 14(c) and implicit in the letter is the South Vietnamese Government's intention to respect democratic liberties. The principal weakness of the case which is put up by the South would appear to be that full investigations by the Commission ought to be able to confirm some of the allegations about Viet Minh activities.

2. To some extent the terms of the South Vietnamese letter tend to involve the Commission and a case might be made for the Commission endeavouring to pursue this matter with the authorities in the South before referring the letter to the Co-Chairmen. We note that the letter starts off with the references to inaction of the Commission re the South Vietnamese communications of last November and December making observations and inquiries about Article 14(c) procedures. The South further allege that the Commission's delay has allowed the PAVN to increase its activities. Secondly, the authorities in the South place an interpretation on Article 14(c) different from that of the Commission and this interpretation presumably has not repeat not been discussed before with the Commission.

3. However, while it might be difficult to object to the Commission attempting to deal to some extent with the letter, we see no useful purpose in the Commission entering into discussions with the South on this matter. We think it would be better if the Commission were to carry on its other activities in the normal way while awaiting the Co-Chairmen's observations. We objected to the Commission commenting to the Co-Chairmen on Giap's letter but each case needs to be examined independently as to whether it requires Commission comments. In this case some explanation might well be given to the Co-Chairmen about the references to the South Vietnamese note of November 14, 1955, and its other communications to the Commission. Secondly, the Commission could also usefully point out to the Co-Chairmen that in the meantime it will carry on its other activities. Thirdly, we would not repeat not object if the Commission stated in its transmittal letter to the Co-Chairmen that its activities under Article 14(c) have been effectively suspended and the Commission can not repeat not therefore continue to discharge what hitherto it has considered its responsibilities. We would like to see this third point made because, in the case of the mobile team at Phuc Hoa, we would wish the Commission to make a somewhat comparable statement to the Co-Chairmen about being unable to discharge its responsibility with regards to arms control.

4. I assume that should Parthasarathi tend to take any extreme position on the action which the Commission now should take, e.g. suspending Commission activities, you will observe that the letter from the South Vietnamese is not repeat not in effect a negation of the principles enunciated in 14(c) and does not repeat not imply that it will not respect the general obligation to permit democratic freedoms for former partisans.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL. Vientiane, November 24, 1956

My dear Mike [Pearson]:

VIETNAM

Before leaving Indochina I thought I would like to write you personal letters giving you some of my quickly formed impressions of the three states I have visited, some of their problems I have had exposed to me and the work of the Canadian Delegations here.

You will realize, of course, that in a flying visit of this kind one can only form snap impressions. Nevertheless, into the time available I have packed a crowded programme with a number of intensely interesting talks and some personal observations of the life of the people here. Perhaps it would be most convenient if I were to set out my thoughts in three separate letters dealing with Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos, respectively.

I was tremendously impressed with President Diem and what he has been able to pull together out of what was regarded as a pretty hopeless situation two years ago. He is a man of courage, conviction and clear conception of the enormous tasks confronting him in trying to restore life and sense of purpose to that half of Vietnam which he has been left by the Geneva Settlement. A report† was sent from Saigon giving an account of my talk with him. The salient points might be summarized as follows:

(a) Diem has established effective political and military control over South Vietnam and has rallied his people to the task of building a new nation.

(b) He now faces the problem of economic improvement through an improved taxation system and building up exports in order to reduce his dependence on United States aid, which reflects on South Vietnamese independence.

(c) He hopes to be able to convince the other countries of southeast Asia that his Government is truly independent and nationalist.

(d) He expects that the position of the Vietminh régime will be weakened due to (i) their pressing "reforms" too far and too fast; (ii) their weak economy and (iii) their obvious dependence on the Chinese whom the Vietnamese traditionally fear. While we were in Saigon, Chou en-Lai was in Hanoi and reports have been circulating that considerable turbulence exists in North Vietnam. It is rumoured that Ho Che Minh may be displaced.

(e) Diem will only hold talks on unification when the position of his Government is stronger and that of the Vietminh weaker. He told me that when the time comes they will not require any intermediaries: "I will deal with Ho Che Minh (if he is still there) myself."

(f) In the meantime he thinks it useful to have the International Commission present to help maintain stability provided that it does not lend itself too much to Vietminh propaganda or facilitate their subversive activities. I think that Diem would like to see the Commission reduced to a smaller sort of peace observation commission with special responsibilities in the demilitarized zone, but of course he is not prepared to negotiate a revision of the armistice agreement with the Vietminh. The Laotian Foreign Minister suggested that later, perhaps within a year, the Commission should be transformed into a body having an abridged term of reference and possibly operating under the United Nations.

I was impressed with the British Ambassador Stephenson, the American Ambassador and my old co-conspirator from United Nations Assembly days, David McNicol, who is the Australian Minister. All these men are doing a first-rate job keeping their governments sympathetically in tune with the metamorphosis in Vietnam and exercise a salutary influence on Diem and his Ministers. They all thought that Canada could and should play an even more active role in Vietnam than it is now doing through the appointment of a more senior representative in Saigon or, even better, through the concurrent establishment of a diplomatic mission. My own observation is that government policy in this part of the world is formulated and often has to be carried out by a handful of hardworking cabinet ministers. If we wish to influence the policy of Vietnam, for instance, we should not try to do so by sending a Second Secretary to see President Diem. Diem told me that Australia and Canada could play a most useful role in Vietnam because their motives were above suspicion, and because they had practical experience of the world today and useful connections with many countries. A good deal of what we might be doing in Vietnam would not fall clearly within the orbit of the International Commission. I would therefore think that it would be wise to give pretty careful consideration to the possibility of opening a Legation or Embassy in Vietnam in the near future and appointing there a really competent officer with facility in French. This would not just be a reporting post, a trade promotion post or a representation post. I think we could exercise influence in Vietnam in a formative period, but if we are to do so it will only be if we appoint there a man of vigorous intellect and persuasive personality. I, of course, know the problem of opening new missions. I realize how our colleagues sometimes react. However, this is one of the really hot spots and an area in which we can do much good of great importance. We have established diplomatic missions (e.g. Latin America) where I am sure the opportunities for making a valuable contribution are not comparable.

The Americans are underwriting the Government economically, but I believe that a few well-chosen French-speaking technical experts sent to South Vietnam would not only make an important contribution in helping these people to meet their many economic development problems but also increase Canada's general influence in the country. None of the Indochina Governments are too well-informed as to the procedures for filing applications for assistance from Canada. They have a vague feeling that because of our French-speaking education and technical training facilities Canada could do a great deal for them. We have promised them this for going on three years now but so far we have actually done very little. I visited two hospitals in Saigon and without saying which field of assistance should have priority, there can be no doubt that the need exists for considerable improvement in health services and health standards.

I do not think that these people should be penalized for shortcomings in their administrative techniques in filing applications for international aid. Their need is a real one which we in Canada are peculiarly well-equipped to meet. And I think we should make more of an effort to help them to help themselves. This is a supplementary function which our delegations are now performing.

The Canadian personnel on the Vietnam Commission are doing a good job. Bruce Williams is an effective Commissioner. The Canadians are placed in a pretty awkward position now because the South is saying "no" to the Commission and this means that the Indians vote with the Poles in criticizing the lack of cooperation from the South. Arthur Menzies had a long session with the boys and I understand that there was general agreement that they would just have to hump their shoulders and weather the storm.

From all this you will see that I was greatly impressed by my first contacts in Indochina. Vietnam is far away from Canada and after more than two years we have perhaps begun to take the presence of the International Commission in that country and in the other states for granted, and to think largely in terms of how we can cut down on our personnel commitments. I was forcefully impressed that tremendous changes have been taking place in Vietnam in parts of the life of the country which are not under the direct observation of the International Commission. These changes will inevitably have a strong influence on the maintenance of a measure of stability in southeast Asia. Canada's name stands very high in Vietnam. I think we should face up to the challenge of doing even more than we are doing today and I will look forward to talking to you about this when I get back. I am already finding the going very strenuous. Perhaps I am going at it a little too hard. But I would like to do a useful tour.

Yours sincerely,
PAUL [MARTIN]

REPORT OF THE LEGAL COMMITTEE ON SUBVERSION, SABOTAGE AND ESPIONAGE

Pursuant to the request in paragraph 8 of your Letter No. 492 of November 7†, I enclose a memorandum which sets forth argumentation to show that the International Commission is competent under the CFA and, moreover, that it is under the obligation to entertain complaints of subversion, sabotage and espionage. We hope that this argumentation will assist you in convincing the Indian Delegation that the Commission should acknowledge without further delay some responsibility with regard to the complaints which have been received from the South Vietnamese.

2. We are wondering, however, what the situation now is in the Commission as a result of the refusal of the South to entertain requests for further investigations under Article 14 (c). It is not that we think that the two issues should be linked. As you know, though, in New Delhi there have been already indications that the Indians consider that it would be difficult for the Commission to do anything about the South Vietnamese complaints if they refuse to cooperate further on Article 14 (c). We do not know what the Indians specifically had in mind but if the South refuse to permit 14 (c) investigations it is hard to see how they could permit investigations into subversion which generally have been part and parcel of the allegations about violations of Article 14 (c). We are under the impression, however, that some of the complaints from the South may be quite separate matters from the 14 (c) complaints. While we would wish to see the Commission formally acknowledge in principle its responsibility to investigate the complaints from the South, we leave it to you to decide whether it is, in fact, feasible to press for actual investigations at the present time.

C.F.A. FOR VIETNAM — SUBVERSION, SABOTAGE AND ESPIONAGE

You have requested that we provide you with the most suitable argumentation to establish the competence of the International Commission in Vietnam with regard to investigations into subversion, sabotage or espionage complaints. In your opinion, the Commission should assume some responsibility with regard thereto and should start investigating the accumulated complaints of South Vietnam relating to subversive activities in its territory. We have also noted in Hanoi's Despatch No. 492 of November 7, 1956,† — attached to your memorandum under reference — that our Acting Commissioner would appreciate our modifying the views set forth in our memorandum of December 15, 1955, which tended to discourage the International Commission from undertaking investigations into complaints of this nature.

2. We have therefore reconsidered our position in this matter and we would now like to offer the following argumentation.

3. The basis of the International Commission's competence in matter of investigation is set forth in article 37 of the C.F.A. which provides that the Commission "procède aux enquêtes nécessaires" — documentary and on the ground — on its own initiative, or on the request of the Joint Commission or of one of the parties. The competence to carry out investigations is the necessary counterpart of the supervisory functions of the International Commission. To supervise the execution of the Geneva Agreement, the Commission fulfils "the tasks of control, observation, inspection and investigation connected with the application of the provisions of the agreement on the cessation of hostilities" (Article 36 of C.F.A.). The competence of International Commission in matters of investigation encompasses all the provisions of the Geneva Agreement.

4. Thus, if acts of subversion, sabotage and espionage come within the scope of any of the provisions of the C.F.A., it must be considered that the International Commission is competent to initiate investigations into complaints relating to such acts.

5. In this connection, it would seem at first sight that articles 10, 22, 24 and 27 of the C.F.A. could have some bearing on the question under review.

6. Article 10 of the C.F.A. provides that the Commanders of the forces of each side shall order and enforce the complete cessation of hostilities by armed forces under their control. (1) Furthermore, article 24 of the C.F.A. provides in part that "the armed forces of each party shall respect the demilitarized zone and the territory under military control of the other party and shall commit no act (2) and undertake no operation against the other party."

7. On the basis of these provisions, we can justify the following conclusions:

"All acts which would run counter to the cessation of hostilities by one party or the military personnel or officials thereof would be a direct violation of article 10 of the C.F.A.;

All acts which would cause prejudice to one party or would be tantamount to a violation of the territory under its control by the other party, the military personnel or officials thereof would be tantamount to a direct violation of article 24 of the C.F.A.;

No party could participate to any such acts as accessory or principal without violating article 10 and 27 of the C.F.A.;

When such act or violation has taken place without the knowledge of a party, the party concerned would be under the obligation to punish the culprit suitably (Article 22 of the C.F.A.) and could be accused of negligence in ensuring full compliance with all the provisions of the agreements (Articles 10 and 27 of the C.F.A.)

8. It now remains to be seen whether acts of subversion, sabotage and espionage could fall within the categories of acts prohibited as mentioned in the above paragraph.

Acts of Subversion are acts having a tendency to subvert or overthrow, (in this particular case, the régime of either zone). (See Oxford Short English Dictionary, page 2066.)

Acts of Sabotage are acts of destruction or terrorism committed by persons dropped or landed behind the lines of a belligerent (in this particular case in the zone of the other party). (Manual of Military Law 1951, part 2, — received in the Dept. from Commonwealth Relations Office on March 9, 1953.)

Acts of Espionage are acts committed by a spy, when acting clandestinely or on false pretences, he obtains or endeavours to obtain information in the zone of the operations of a belligerent with the intention of communicating it to the other party. (Article 29 of the 1907 Hague Convention regarding laws and customs of war on land.)

9. In our opinion all of these acts would run counter to the spirit of the Geneva agreements as a whole. Furthermore, they fall under the prohibitions laid down in Articles 10 and 24 of the C.F.A., when committed by military personnel or officials of one party. These acts are acts of belligerency and necessarily imply a violation of the zone of the other party and, to say the least, they necessarily cause prejudice to the party against which they are committed.

10. Subversion, sabotage and espionage are justified in time of war; it could also be argued that they could be justified if the C.F.A. were a mere armistice agreement in the wider sense of the term. The C.F.A., however, is not a mere armistice agreement, i.e. "all agreements between belligerent forces for a temporary cessation of hostilities". (Oppenheim's International Law, Volume 2, page 546.) The Geneva agreement is not a temporary cessation of hostilities but was meant to restore a state of lasting peace in Vietnam. In our opinion, it must be assimilated to preliminaries of peace. "Although ready to terminate the war through a treaty of peace, belligerents are frequently not able to settle all the terms at once. In such cases hostilities usually are brought to an end by so-called preliminaries of peace ... such preliminaries are a treaty in themselves, embodying an agreement between the parties regarding such terms of peace as are essential ... The purpose for which preliminaries of peace are agreed upon makes it obvious that such essential terms as are stipulated by them are the basis of the definite treaty of peace". (Oppenheim's International Law, Volume 2, page 607.)

11. We therefore come to the conclusion that the International Commission is competent and under the obligation to entertain complaints of subversion, sabotage and espionage.

12. You will have noted from the foregoing comments that although we have envisaged the question under review from a different angle, we nevertheless share the views of the Indian and Canadian representatives on the Commission's Legal Committee, set forth in their report of January 13, 1956. (Although this does not come within the scope of this memorandum we also agree with paras 5, 6 and 7 of the above mentioned report.) We also fully appreciate the reasons which prompted our Delegation to redraft three times this first report in order to meet the revised Indian views on this question, just as we appreciate that it is impossible for Mr. Williams to insist upon the first report being accepted as basis of the Commission's competence in such matters. Although less satisfactory, we nevertheless think that the third Canadian re-draft is acceptable and that it might perhaps serve the same purpose. You may therefore inform Hanoi that we have reconsidered our position as set forth in our memorandum of December 15, 1955 and that we entirely share with their views.

(1) (The terms "Commander of forces" and "Armed forces" must be read in the general context of the Geneva Agreements. It must be emphasized that the Geneva settlement was not meant to divide Vietnam in two different States. In fact, pending reunification, Vietnam was only divided in two regrouping zones in which the civil administration was to be conducted by the party whose forces were regrouped therein (article 14 (a) of the C.F.A.) Thus, the Geneva Agreements could not be signed in the name of recognized governments but were signed in the name of Commanders in Chief of forces who represented the authority of each party. It is, therefore, our opinion that the term "Commander of the forces" used in the Geneva Agreement must be construed as meaning each party as a whole and not only the military authorities. Similarly, the term "Armed forces" must be construed as including all officials of each party; this interpretation is also justified by a close reading of article 27 of the C.F.A. which stipulates that the "Commander of forces shall make all arrangements necessary to ensure full compliance of the agreement by all elements and military personnel under their Command." This interpretation seems also to be confirmed by Article 28 of the C.F.A. which provides that the responsibility for the execution of the agreement rests with the parties.

(2) "Acts against a party" must be construed as meaning acts which would cause prejudice to a party within the context of the C.F.A.

CANADIAN POLICY ON THE COMMISSION

We were very interested to have your broad assessment of the Commission's activities, particularly with reference to the record of misdemeanours which have been chalked up against the two parties in Vietnam. It is unnecessary for us to say that on our part too the iniquity of the way in which the balance of right and wrong in the Interim Reports generally has been tipped in favour of the Vietminh has deeply irritated our sense of justice. The reasons for this rather unfair slant arise generally from conditions over which we have little or no control, e.g. the very different nature of the two régimes in Vietnam, the hitherto unsympathetic attitude which the Indians have shown towards the South, the inadequacies of certain articles of the Cease-Fire Agreement in the situation which now obtains, and finally some of the procedures which have developed within the Commission. We well understand that sometimes the psychological atmosphere in which you are obliged to work becomes oppressive; and we realize that to try to shape the record to meet our sense of justice requires a Herculean task. I should like to assure you that the efforts which you and all your colleagues make to cope with the relentless pressure of Communist tactics is greatly appreciated here.

2. The presence of the Commission in Vietnam serves the interests of both the Vietminh and the Republic of Vietnam to a greater or lesser degree. Vietnam remains one of the more sensitive areas on the periphery of the Communist and non-Communist worlds and the Vietminh being a rather aggressive movement, it is useful to have the Commission in Vietnam to keep a keen international eye on what the Communists are doing. We noted that President Diem alluded to this fact during his chat with the Honourable Paul Martin. The advantages which the Vietminh obtain from the presence of the Commission appear to be largely propaganda and we commend your efforts to keep such advantages within reasonable bounds. In these circumstances, our primary goal, therefore, remains to keep the Commission in being. (As you know, we would welcome a reduction in the Commission's activities. However, I do not propose to speculate in this despatch how this objective might be achieved.)

3. Your analysis of the various problems which arise out of the specific activities of the Commission points up the ways and means by which we can endeavour to have the record more accurately reflect the extent of compliance of the two parties with the letter and to some extent the spirit of the Cease Fire settlement. We found Appendix "A" to your despatch a most constructive and useful approach to this problem. The analysis of how the Commission can better exercise its specific responsibilities of supervision and control and the careful thought to the consequent way in which the record can be brought more to reflect the facts of the situation seem to us to chart the course which you should take in current Commission activities and in preparing for negotiations on the Seventh Interim Report. As you suggest, appropriate action by and large must begin on the team and the committee level and all concerned should miss no opportunity to "give events little nudges in the right direction". Indeed, this would seem to be the principle upon which your colleagues, the Poles, have operated.

4. You have raised the question of how far you should go in collaborating with the South Vietnamese, particularly in devising tactics and in preparing complaints for submission to the Commission. We think it most important that you maintain the position that the Canadian Delegation will not be blind advocates of the South in the Commission. We would wish you also to continue the practice of offering friendly advice to the South Vietnamese so that they will understand better how to meet the requirements of the Commission. There is no objection to your discussing with the South what complaints should be submitted to the Commission and how they should be prepared in order to obtain the most satisfactory measure of supervision and control. We hesitate to take any initiative on the matter of complaints with the State Department, not because the objective which you have in mind is not desirable — we think it is — but because we think this objective more likely would be obtained through a pragmatic approach on the spot. We have in mind the opportunities which have been presented with respect to Article 14 (c) as a result of the arrival of the nineteen refugees in Saigon. If you believe that more adequate and specific complaints could be prepared by the South you might discuss the possibilities with the U.S. and U.K. officials with whom you normally discuss Commission business. We agree that in view of the inexperience of South Vietnamese officials, it would be undesirable for you to become more involved in dealing directly with the South Vietnamese and that your representations on specific matters for the Commission agenda should be confined largely to the Chief Liaison Officer.

5. In paragraph 11 of your despatch under reference you have referred to the way in which the activities of the Commission and the performance of the two parties have developed over the last two months. We appreciate that there is a good deal in the record over this period which reflects upon the South. Nevertheless it seems to us that recent developments have not been one-sided and that there is a not inconsiderable amount of material which can be used to obtain a more satisfactory Interim Report. Particularly we have in mind coastal reconnaissance in the North, the Xa Doai Seminary, the apparent suspension in team activities at Phuc Hoa, Article 14 (c) in relation to the recent uprisings, and the PAVN non-representation on the Joint Commission. Another matter which has occurred to us but on which we do not have enough information to judge the possibilities of raising doubts about the Vietminh is the activities of the Langson and Haiphong teams. In the light of the way in which the Poles have made a nuisance of the Saigon fixed team, we are wondering whether a similar degree of supervision and control of trains at Langson and ships at Paighong would yield similar returns.

6. Periodic surveys of the Commission's activities of the type which you provided are indeed very useful exercises as they serve to focus attention on some of the more general aspects of our participation and tactics in the Commission. We find such despatches of considerable assistance in the process of constantly reviewing our role in Vietnam. Your despatch also has assisted us in considering what lines of action we should follow during the coming period.

REPORT OF THE LEGAL COMMITTEE ON SUBVERSION, SABOTAGE AND ESPIONAGE: ITS RELATIONSHIP TO SOUTH VIETNAM'S ATTITUDE TOWARDS ARTICLE 14(C)

Thank you for the memorandum attached to your letter. It will be helpful, especially if the Indians in the Commission are given any latitude by their Government. There are three points in the memorandum which we do not propose to use, as they do not seem essential to the argument and all three might cause us difficulty in the future, particularly when the Commission gets around to formulating its interpretation of Articles 16 and 17.

2. The first of these points is contained in the footnote to paragraph 4, i.e. footnote (1), which expands the meaning of the term "Commander of the Forces". It will probably be part of the strategy in our attack on Protocol 23, which is also signed for the "Commander of the Forces", to attempt to cast doubt on the binding nature of the Protocol to the extent that it modifies the Agreement in that the signatories lacked the full powers necessary for the conclusion of an amendment to the Agreement. For our present purpose, it does not seem necessary to stress that the Agreement has civil effects notwithstanding its signature by military officers.

3. The second point we would not wish to use is also contained in footnote (1); we do not want to emphasize that it was not the intention of the Agreement to divide Vietnam into two States, as, superficially at any rate, the present division of the country appears to be the fault of the South in not agreeing to Vietnam-wide elections. Then, too, it might be argued that acts of subversion, sabotage and espionage were only state offences; if North and South Vietnam were not, for the purposes of the Agreement, to be regarded as separate states, then it might be asserted that neither could be charged with such offences.

4. The third point is that contained in paragraph 8 of the memorandum. Here, as well, we have in mind the problems which will face us regarding Articles 16 and 17. Our major argument in pressing for an interpretation of Articles 16 and 17 which would permit the South to import quantities of armaments and munitions equalling those taken out by the French is that as the Agreement is an Armistice Agreement, it looks to the maintenance of the status quo ante. We do not want in our approach to subversion, sabotage and espionage to lend support to the idea that the Cease Fire Agreement in Vietnam was more than a normal Armistice Agreement, since if it were a sort of preliminary Peace Treaty, the status quo ante argument might largely go by the board.

5. In your letter you enquire what the situation now is in the Commission as regards the subversion, sabotage and espionage report in view of the refusal of the South to entertain requests for further investigations under Article 14(c). We agree with you that the two issues should not be linked, although there seems little question but that the Indians will form such a link in their own minds. The Indian Legal Adviser informed our representative on the Legal Committee recently that he had received advice from his Government regarding the report but that there were points on which he was seeking clarification. This was confirmed by General Brar, the Indian Acting Commissioner, in a conversation with me on Thursday when he said that his Delegation had received conflicting advice from the Law Ministry and their Ministry of External Affairs and he had written to the former Chairman, Ambassador Parthasarathi, asking the latter to take the matter up with Desai and to resolve this conflict of opinion.

6. You impression that some of the complaints from the South may be quite separate matters from 14(c) complaints is quite correct. Many of the South's charges arise out of different sets of facts from those alleged by the North as the basis for their charges of violation of Article 14(c). That is, most of the South's charges stand by themselves and investigation into them would be, usually, quite independent of 14(c) investigations. The South have, of course, often stated that subversion, sabotage and espionage were the reasons for arrests, etc. about which the PAVN had submitted complaints, but the South does not ask for Commission action on all of these, but merely submits its counter-charges as an adequate defence to the particular 14(c) allegations.

7. I think we should keep in mind that the South does not officially take the position that they are opposed to 14(c) investigations per se; they are only against the PAVN using the Article for propaganda purposes. What the South complains of with regard to 14(c) is that the Commission dignifies the flimsiest PAVN allegations under 14(c) by taking note of them without requiring a real prima facie case to be made before calling for the South's comments.

8. Whether it will be feasible for us to press for actual investigations of Southern allegations of acts of subversion, sabotage and espionage will depend, in the first place, on whether we have been able to persuade the Indians to adopt a Report which will in fact establish a basis for such investigations. On the other hand, the South may not bestir itself any more vigorously to lodge complaints after the adoption of the Report, whatever its nature, than they have hitherto; it has always been open to the South to inflict upon the Commission a deluge of such complaints which would match in quantity the hundreds of complaints of violation of 14(c) put in by the North. Up to the present, the South has not submitted a great number of such complaints.

Memorandum from Far Eastern Division to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

ARMS CONTROL IN VIETNAM: PHUC HOA

You will recall that on January 4 you approved a telegram (No. Y-7†) to our Delegation in Vietnam concerning the situation with respect to arms control at Phuc Hoa which instructed our Commissioner to endeavour to move the Commission towards a frank recognition of the inefficacy of arms control. This instruction was sent pursuant to a decision of the Minister last September (Telegram No. YY-196 of September 27) that if there was any more trouble at Phuc Hoa we should give serious consideration to exposing the facts of so-called arms control in the frankest terms. We have now learned that our Delegation already had agreed to the Indian proposals concerning the return of yet another team to Phuc Hoa when our Telegram No. Y-7 of January 4 (copy attached) was sent from here. The result is that while the views of the Canadian Delegation concerning arms control in the North have to some extent been set out in the record of the Commission, unfortunately the opportunity provided by these further difficulties at Phuc Hoa has not been used to move the Commission further towards obtaining an acknowledgement of the ineffectiveness of the arms control measures on the Vietnamese-Chinese border. The attached telegram which is submitted for your approval is designed to explore with our Delegation what other steps might now be taken in order to comply with our objective of dispelling the illusion that arms control is effective. In this connection it has been our view for some time that a frank acknowledgement of the situation with respect to arms control might be a useful first step in obtaining some rationalization of the Commission's activities.

2. On the matter of our Commissioner committing the Canadian Delegation before our instructions were received, it was his assessment that we would not get the Indians to agree to a special report on the situation at Phuc Hoa; and he feared that if we were more difficult the Indian Delegation, which at the present time is temporarily headed by its alternate delegate, in order to counteract us might not continue to take even the moderate position which it had adopted. It would appear that, owing to the length of time which telegrams are currently taking between Ottawa and Hanoi, our Commissioner felt obliged to act without waiting for the instructions which he had requested. This incident points up of course the continuing difficulty to provide any day to day guidance to our delegation in Vietnam.

3. We attach considerable importance to the treatment of the team at Phuc Hoa. Not only are we concerned to ensure that the next Interim Report will bring out the story of DRVN non-compliance and begin to record the inadequacy of arms control in the north, but we want to begin to provide grounds for insisting on a reduction of Commission activities in Vietnam on terms which will reflect adversely on the DRVN rather than on the Diem government.

PHUC HOA

We are sorry that Brar put this item on the agenda before you had received our comments contained in Telegram No. Y-7 on the more recent developments. We take it that the situation now is that the Vietminh have been cited for non-cooperation pursuant to Article 43 and that authority of the PAVN has been sought to send another team to Phuc Hoa.

2. As you have pointed out, this business of a Commission team popping in and out of Phuc Hoa has rendered arms control in the North more farcical than ever. As indicated in the Minister's telegram No. YY-196 of September 27, our primary concern is not so much to show the sins of omission of the Vietminh with respect to arms control but rather to move the Commission towards a frank and forthright acknowledgement of the weakness in the system of arms control which the Commission has been able to establish within the framework of the Cease Fire Agreement. Even though the recording of a violation of Article 43 in this case may be considered a step forward, it does not meet our fundamental point unless the Indian Delegation is prepared to explain the full implications of this violation in the Seventh Interim Report.

3. In our view a full explanation about this violation of Article 43 by the Vietminh should include:

(a) the continued refusal of the PAVN to give the assurances requested by the Commission that the team will be permitted to function effectively in the conditions required by the Commission;

(b) the failure of the Vietminh to comply with Commission recommendations which include the requests for uninterrupted control and permanent logistic arrangements;

(c) an explicit statement that the resulting inadequacy in control means that the Vietminh could be violating Articles 16 and 17 without the Commission being able to discover the facts;

(d) this frustration of the Commission is especially serious because it affects a special responsibility of the Commission under Article 36(d).

It is also our view that the time has come when the record about arms control as such should be completed and the facts brought into the open, i.e.

(a) that the system of control set out in the CFA is inadequate,

(b) that the Commission has made a great effort in studying how it can best fulfill its responsibilities in these circumstances and that it is obviously possible for the provisions concerning arms control to be violated in either zone and

(c) that in the light of the behaviour of the Vietminh there would seem to be grounds for suspicions that violations may have taken place in the North without the Commission becoming aware of the facts.

4. In the light of your telegram No. 4 of January 4, we are re-examining here how we might best try to obtain some commitment from the Indian Delegation about incorporating in the Seventh Interim Report a statement along the lines of paragraph 3 above. We would appreciate receiving from you as full a statement as you are able to provide about the Indian position. We think that it would still be useful for you to obtain from Brar an exposition of the views of the Indian Delegation on the way in which the Commission has been frustrated by the Vietminh in fulfilling its special responsibilities under Article 36(d). Does the Indian Delegation make any qualitative assessment and agree that consistent obstruction of the Commission with respect to Article 36(d) should be taken as an extremely serious matter? In attempting to draw Brar out, you might ask him how the Indian Delegation proposes to explain to the Co-Chairmen in the next interim report why the Commission continues to return to Phuc Hoa after being thrown out three times and when it still has no assurances from the PAVN. On the occasion of the last return to Phuc Hoa we declared that in our view neither the Commission's dignity nor its responsibilities were being safeguarded. We are now concerned lest criticism of the Commission should be made when the Seventh Interim Report is published. You may indicate our views to Brar and, if it seems useful, state that we will expect a "thorough airing" along these lines in the Seventh Interim Report.

5. It has occurred to us that one way to commit the Indian Delegation might be in a communication from the Commission to the Vietminh. What we have in mind is that some of the implications of the Vietminh obstruction over Phuc Hoa should be spelled out in detail in a Commission letter to the PAVN High Command. We are wondering whether the communication to the Vietminh which is referred to in paragraph 2 of your Telegram No. 4. might not include a statement that the Commission has decided that the behaviour of the Vietminh warrants the finding of a violation of Article 43. At the same time, the Commission would spell out some of the implications of this violation which are outlined above. It has also occurred to us that if the Vietminh concurrence for another team has not yet been received then the Commission might send a hastener to the Vietminh stating that this continued interruption in control creates a very serious substantive problem and that the Commission, in view of this continued enforced gap in the control arrangements, will be obliged to report in due course to the Co-Chairmen that it has not been possible to establish effective arms control in the North and that it is obviously a matter of serious concern whether violations of Articles 16 and 17 have taken place in the past and continue to take place.

6. Please reply urgently.

PHUC HOA

We have examined our telegram No. Y17 of January 8, which crossed your telegram in transmission, in the light of the suggestions in your telegram. We continue to think it useful for you to endeavour to move the Indian Delegation, and the Commission, if possible, towards some frank statement about arms control insofar as it is affected by the situation at Phuc Hoa. We should therefore be grateful provided a team is not yet in situ at Phuc Hoa if you would take action as suggested in our telegram Y17.

2. With regard to paragraph 2 of your telegram it appears to us that if the situation arose in which the Vietminh should have already indicated, before you could have acted as suggested in our telegram Y17, that a team may return but for only one month, you might enquire of Brar whether he considers that the Commission should return on that basis. It would be useful to have a full statement of his views. However we do not think that it would be useful otherwise to delay providing a member for the team. In returning to Phuc Hoa the Commission should indicate to the PAVN that it is doing so because of the importance of having a team at Phuc Hoa and in the hope that the PAVN will review their position and will offer more cooperation than has been forthcoming in the past.

3. You raise in paragraph 3 the question of a full-scale debate on arms control as such. We have always held the view that it should be possible to present the facts of limited effectiveness of arms control quite impartially without reflection on either party or on the Commission. Please refer to our telegram YY-96 of July 18 which is in effect the basic document on this problem. In our subsequent instructions concerning arms control at Phuc Hoa we have consistently considered the necessity of avoiding any reflection on the Commission. The situation as we see it is what the Commission's record at Phuc Hoa has been without blemish but that if the Commission continues to go back after being thrown out for the third time without explicitly stating the implications of these breaks in control, then it will lay itself open to criticism. The situation at Phuc Hoa, it seems to us, creates an ideal situation for stating that arms control in the North cannot be considered as having been effective.

4. We agree that any acknowledgement of the facts of arms control at Phuc Hoa by the Commission as described in the preceding paragraph may tend to provoke a general debate on arms control as such. We also agree that some of the modalities which were agreed upon in the early days of the Commission have militated against effective control. However we have never considered that an exposition by the Commission of the inadequacy of arms control would necessarily have to go into such detail. The CFA created a general framework in which it has been very difficult for the Commission to operate. We do not envisage therefore that it should be necessary to make any suggestion that the Commission has been lax in its control procedures and duties in order to make the important points which we have outlined in our telegram Y17.

PHUC HOA

We have had an opportunity to discuss both with General Brar repeat Brar and with two members of the Indian Delegation who are normally influential in determining Indian policy on important matters, the questions raised in your telegrams under reference. Quite frankly the conversation with Brar was not repeat not too useful. It was apparent that Brar really has not repeat not considered the long term implications of the Commission's ability to maintain a team on continuous duty at Phuc Hoa. Moreover, he does not repeat not seem to be too anxious to have the Commission state quite clearly what have been the weaknesses in the system of some control which the Commission has been able to establish within the framework of the Cease-Fire Agreement. His two political officers were somewhat more forthright on this particular aspect of the matter. The Commission should, in their view, when commenting on control at Phuc Hoa under Articles 16 and 17 in the interim report, simply state the facts. The conclusions to be drawn from the implications in a given situation should be left to the reader.

2. In spite of the intransigent attitude of the Indian Delegation I do not repeat not think that we will encounter too much difficulty in getting them to go along with us in the next interim report with a statement which would clearly point out:

(a) the continued refusal of the PAVN to give the assurances requested by the Commission that the team would be permitted to function effectively;

(b) the failure of the PAVN to comply with the Commission's recommendations; and

(c) the special responsibilities of the Commission in terms of Article 36;

(d) I am not repeat not hopeful that the Indians could be induced to support an explicit statement that the resulting inadequacy in control at Phuc Hoa means that the PAVN could be violating Articles 16 and 17 without the Commission being able to discover the facts.

3. Whether we like it or not repeat not, the Indians seem unwilling to adopt any posture which might be construed as criticism of the past efforts of the Commission. Even to suggest that the system of control provided by the Cease-Fire Agreement is inadequate upsets them. Their immediate reply is generally along the lines that if either of the parties were dissatisfied they should have approached the Commission or the Commission itself should have raised the matter in the early days of the Commission.

4. It is difficult to get the Indians unduly upset about the Commission's difficulties with the PAVN over Phuc Hoa when we have had difficulties in the South in terms of Article 36(d) on the question of reconnaissance and control of airports and ports. Once again whether we like it or not repeat not the Indians immediately turn every query that we make about the inadequacies of the control system in the context of Phuc Hoa to problems with which the Commission faces in the South which are more numerous.

5. The foregoing is probably not repeat not as constructive as you had hoped. We are satisfied that we are keeping up the pressure on the Indians about Phuc Hoa at just about the right level. Unfortunately it does not repeat not produce quite result that we know you would like.

6. It is still not repeat not clear to me whether you would like us to initiate a debate in the Commission on the specific question of the inadequacies of the arms control system. If we do and if we keep it strictly impartial and within the confines of no repeat no adverse reflections on the Commission, I am not repeat not confident that the conclusions which will be drawn will be that in the North the arms control has been ineffective. In fact it is possible that on the basis of impartial study and on the prime facie evidence available to the Commission the case of the South will appear in a very bad light compared to that of the North.

ARTICLE 14(C)

We asked Col Nam of the SVLM today if any decision had yet been reached on the attitude which the South would adopt to the communication dated January 7 from the Commission. Nam replied the question of procedure for entertaining 14(c) allegations could not repeat not be separated from that of the principle itself of whether Article 14(c) was still valid and pointed out that the Commission in a letter dated January 17 had informed the South that it could not repeat not accept the position adopted by the South outlined in the South's letters of November 17 and December 19, 1956, (Hanoi letter 14 of January 2†).

2. We got the impression from Nam that the South will not repeat not, for the time being anyway, formally denounce 14(c) but will "laisser traîner l'affaire" and probably not repeat not reply to the two communications from the Commission. In the meanwhile we do not repeat not see the possibility of any improvement in cooperation of the South on 14(c) investigations or inquiries. Nam reiterated several times that the position of principle by his government had been made clear in the letters of November 17 and December 19 and that this position of principle superseded the question of procedure the subject of the memorandum from the French Liaison Mission dated January 4, 1956.

3. We told Nam that the Indians and the Poles would become increasingly difficult over the lack of cooperation from the South on 14(c) and that some increased cooperation or indication of goodwill would be needed to fend off the Commission bringing the issue to a head.

REPORT OF THE LEGAL COMMITTEE ON SUBVERSION, SABOTAGE AND ESPIONAGE

When the Report came before the Commission for adoption on November 2, 1956, the Chairman requested a four weeks postponement in order to permit him to consult the Law Officers of the Government of India. This week the Indians reopened the discussions which they had had with us before the November 2 Commission meeting in an endeavour to persuade us to agree to the adoption of a report differing essentially from the original, to which their own Legal Adviser and ours had agreed. We informed you in some detail of the previous discussions in our letter No. 492, dated November 7, 1956.†

2. Our latest conversations have disclosed that the net result of the consultations which it has taken the Indian Delegation three months to conclude with their home authorities is the change of one word in the so-called "third redraft" which they put up to us before the November 2 meeting (Annexure 6(a) letter 492), and which we found unacceptable. There is now no question, they say, of their acceptance in the Commission of anything approaching their own Legal Adviser's original report. I enclose a copy of the draft to which they say they are now fully committed. The only change they have made in their third redraft of October 31, 1956, is to replace the words "if a link is conclusively established", with the words "if a link is established with reasonable certainty".

3. In your telegram No. YY 335 of November 30, 1956†, you said you considered our third redraft an adequate basis for Commission activities with respect to subversion. In this redraft we proposed four modifications of the Indian third redraft. Three of these the Indians have made no attempt to take into account and the fourth receives the barest recognition in the one modification noted above, constituting the only difference between their latest draft and the one they proposed on October 31.

4. In this week's discussions we have used the argumentation you furnished us with your letter Y 238 of December 3, 1956, with the reservations which we mentioned in our letter No. 6 of December 29.† We also went over again some of the questions we had asked concerning the third Indian redraft, questions which remain to be asked with regard to this final draft of February 6, 1957. In view of their inflexible decision not to discuss further the original report there was no point in raising a second time the basic questions posed by their repudiation of it. As reported in my telegram under reference, they have, in fact, volunteered an explanation of why they refuse to consider the original report when they tell us they really do not think the Cease-Fire Agreement covers subversion.

5. When we asked why, in paragraph 2 of the latest Indian draft, the word "and" was substituted for the word "to" between the words "zone" and "organize" in place of our proposal of the words "in order to", we received no clear reply. But the likely explanation seems to be that the substitution of the word "and" in place of the word "to" is designed to remove from the ambit of the prohibited activity the mere despatch of Vietminh agents to the South; under the paragraph as drafted at present it appears that it would not be sufficient for the South merely to catch and identify a Vietminh agent south of the border but it would also be necessary to prove some overt act of violence in the South on the part of the agent. The likelihood of this explanation is supported by their reasons for using the word "abet" in place of the word "organize" and their rejection of the words "by encouraging", in paragraph 3. They have told us it is their intention to restrict operation of this paragraph to the actual commission of a violent act by a Vietminh partisan already in the South and that act the very one he had been instructed to perform by the Party.

6. Our enquiries regarding our proposal to clarify paragraph 5 (which provides for the procedure the Commission would follow in entertaining a complaint of subversion, sabotage or espionage and taking action on it) were met with the response that the additional words we had proposed were redundant. We had suggested that the word "reasonable" should be inserted before the word "evidence" in the first sentence and that the words "in accordance with the usual Commission practices" should be inserted after the words "after investigation of the complaint" in the second sentence. The object of these proposals was to place Commission procedures with regard to S.S. & E. complaints on all fours with the procedure the Commission follows in taking action on 14(c) complaints lodged by the North. The objection we took to the word "conclusively" has been met by the substitution of the words "with reasonable certainty" but little consideration has been shown our desire to point up the distinction between the amount of evidence required for the Commission to entertain a subversion complaint and the degree of proof required eventually for the Commission to find a violation of the Cease Fire Agreement.

7. The effect of this Indian draft which they have proposed in place of the original report has been to remove subversion and espionage from the range of prohibited activity and to narrow the application of the Agreement to the prohibiting of sabotage. This is in the face of the explicit prohibitions of Articles 24 and 10.

8. In my telegram under reference I said that in view of the Indians' determination to bring in a very narrow report we ourselves should now consider maintaining support of the original report. If we go along with the Indians in scuttling the original, we shall have again followed a course of action with which we have become all too familiar; first making substantial concessions in order to move towards ground on which the Indians stand beckoning to us, only to have them move smartly away to a still more distant position once we have arrived at what was former common ground.

9. I think a review of the treatment accorded by the Commission to "complaints concerning subversion, sabotage and espionage" in the Seventh Interim Report might make interesting reading, interesting enough possibly to form part of a minority Canadian report if necessary. I do not think such a shaping of the record would benefit by our acceptance of what finally emerged from the Commission's ratiocinations over an 18 month period concerning the basis on which it might take cognizance of such complaints.

10. So long as there was a chance that the Indians, while rejecting their own original report, might accept a set of criteria for weighing Southern complaints of Vietminh subversion, sabotage and espionage, which would give some chance of even limited success, we were in duty bound to make every attempt to reach agreement with the Indians. If we had got a good report adopted by the Commission, there might have been some possibility that complaints by the South of S.S. & E., which came squarely within the report's provisions might have been entertained by the Commission and the resulting action might have been the registering of violations of the Agreement by the North. Or the Commission's failure to deal with complaints which satisfied its own criteria as laid down in the report would have pointed up bias in favour of the North. With a report such as the Indians now propose, the chances of a complaint from the South satisfying either the substantive or procedural criteria would appear to be reduced almost to zero. If we go along with the Indians in accepting their proposed report we shall have pretty well absolved the Commission from any charge of failing to give consideration to the South's complaints concerning subversion, sabotage and espionage and it seems fairly certain that consideration of any complaint would merely result in its rejection.

11. While we do not know the Polish attitude towards the new Indian draft report, it seems probable that they will reject it, particularly if they were unaware that we also intended not to accept it. If each one of the Delegations maintained a separate position and each put forward an independent view of the Agreement's attitude towards subversion, sabotage and espionage (we would rest simply on the original Legal Committee Report) such a situation of deadlock would compel attention in the Seventh Interim Report. On the other hand, even if the Poles are particularly astute and support the latest Indian draft, our rejection of it and continuance to stand by the original report would leave us in a fairly strong position for any minority report on the subversion issue which we might find it necessary to come up with.

12. As this whole question of the Commission's cognizance of subversion, sabotage and espionage has developed I have come to wonder whether it would be better to have no report adopted at all — not even the original. It is just possible that the South would be reluctant to have the Commission investigate their complaints of S.S. & E. if it meant the employment of mobile teams which would, by the very nature of the complaints, require the teams to pry into probably disaffected, or at least disturbed areas in the South. The South might be even more difficult if these were double-barrelled investigations linked with PAVN complaints under Article 14(c). It is extremely improbable that the Commission would move to a decision concerning any subversion complaint on the basis of documentary evidence alone; the North could be counted on to match any documentation the South could ever furnish. It would certainly be an anomaly if, as we suspect is quite possible, the South were to decline to give concurrence for the despatch of a mobile team to investigate a complaint which they themselves had made.

13. In view of the possible attitude of the South upon the one hand and of the Commission on the other, I doubt that investigation into Vietminh subversion in the South would be likely to produce any useful result. A team carrying out an investigation would probably get bogged down somehow. There would most likely be ample opportunity for the Pole and the Indian to twist the evidence to such an extent that it would, as they presented it, disprove any Southern allegation, and might even prove some 14(c) violation on the part of the South. I come back, therefore, to my doubtfulness of the value of having any basis at all for the Commission to go through the motions of carrying out subversion investigations. The present situation might be regarded as an opportunity to keep the whole question of subversion as a major argument in a shaping of the record when the final report on the Commission activities is to be made, viz: although the Commission has been zealous in prosecuting enquiries into complaints under Article 14(c) it has not shown the same readiness to consider complaints of subversion, sabotage and espionage.

14. In deciding whether to accept or reject the toothless report which the Indians now propose, the determining factor would appear to be whether we are ready to annoy the Indians. We may be sure they will be very, very cross with us if we insist on drawing attention to their rejection of their own original report. On the other hand, if we maintain our support of the original report we might succeed in a rather neat piece of work which might be of advantage in shaping the record. By holding fast to the original report, which we have good grounds to do, and thereby bringing about deadlock in the Commission on the subversion issue, the result would be that the Commission would continue to do nothing about a whole category of Southern complaints of violations of the Cease Fire Agreement. There is a possibility that the Poles might, of course, find previously-undiscovered virtues in the new Indian draft, once we had announced our rejection of it, although perhaps this might be that classic case when Poldel and Candel were united, though for different reasons, against an Indian proposal.

15. So that we may bear as little of the responsibility as possible for the Commission's delay in coming to a decision on the subversion issue, and in view of your opinion that our third redraft of October 31, 1956, provided an adequate basis for the Commission to undertake consideration of complaints of subversion, sabotage and espionage, I should be grateful if you would cable me your instructions as soon as possible whether we should now accept the new Indian draft or stand by the original report or our third redraft.

16. Although we have tended in conversations with the South Vietnamese and indeed the British here to argue that the South should not slam the door on 14(c) until we had had a chance to do something about subversion, the time may now have come to let the South Vietnamese force the pace on 14(c) and the Commission to remain sterile on S.S. & E.

VIETNAM: REDUCTION OF COMMISSION ACTIVITIES

Your telegram was welcome here as a further indication of Indian interest in reduction of Commission activities which is being stimulated by current financial talks in New Delhi between French and Indians. We would be grateful if you would let us know the name of the member of the Indian Delegation who spoke to you and whether you think that his informal approach had the blessing of the Indian Chairman and is designed to obtain our reactions on the subject.

2. We are constantly reviewing possible ways of reducing Commission activities and responsibilities and have discussed subject with Carter. We would, of course, welcome any approaches from or suggestions by Indians on ways and means of achieving reductions. As the Indians are apparently now thinking along these lines the chances of success are improved. We do not think, however, that the task will be easy and we must be careful not to trip over the stumbling bloc which you have pointed out. As you know, we have continuously adhered to the line that the Commission has no responsibility for elections and we would not repeat not wish to depart from this stand. You should resist firmly therefore any attempt by your colleagues to have the Commission make any recommendations or pronouncements concerning future general elections and reunification of the country. These points, upon which the PAVN may demand assurances as a price in agreeing to reductions, are the responsibility of the parties to the Cease-Fire Agreement and of the Geneva Conference Powers who support the Geneva settlement.

3. We agree with your assessment of the most important jobs left to the Commission and, provided the stumbling block can be avoided, we think it is time to start studying means of implementing a reduction procedure. The memo attached to your letter of June 14, 1956, provides us with a basic plan for reduction. We would suggest that, as a first step in the plan, you might commence an examination of the records of the Commission to see which fixed teams have filed nil reports during the last few months. If, as we suspect, some of the team sites such as Moung Sen and Tan Chau have been conducting no regular fixed team business for some time, we think a case could be made for their elimination. We realize that some of the fixed teams are used for 14(c) investigations but this should not be a reason per se for retaining these fixed teams. Mobile teams from Headquarters could, if necessary, take over investigations of this kind. In order to get the Pole's agreement on reduction of team sites, you will probably have to plan for equal reductions on both sides of the demarcation line. This should not, however, pose too great a problem as we imagine that there are teams in both the North and South which have little or nothing to do.

14(C) — INDIAN APPROACH TO US

Prasad, the Political Adviser dealing with freedoms matters in the Indian Delegation came to see us this morning and suggested the following plan to save the South from numerous findings of non-cooperation under Article 25. He is particularly worried about a list of cases to which the South has offered no repeat no replies whatsoever and which will be on the agenda within the next two weeks. The plan he proposes is his own and has not repeat not got the blessings of the Indian Delegation. Before putting it to his superiors, he would like to get through us, the comments of the South Vietnamese. His plan is as follows:

(a) We cannot repeat cannot defend the South on the merits of the pending cases. In at least 30 cases and probably many more it will be practically impossible not repeat not to reach findings of non-cooperation under Article 25 against the South.

(b) The only way to avoid this is to get from the South a letter reaffirming the principles mentioned in their letters of November 17 and December 15 and asserting that because of their interpretation of Article 14(c) they cannot repeat cannot consider any past, present or future correspondence on this article nor agree to any request by the Commission to despatch mobile teams to investigate 14(c) allegations. We could complete Prasad's suggested letter by having incorporated in it the suggestions mentioned in paragraph 2 of your telegram Y53 February 12.†

(c) This letter should be sent to the Commission within the next 15 days so that it would be received before routine 14(c) cases come up on the agenda.

(d) This letter would then be considered by the Commission prior to the routine cases. The Commission would not repeat not ask the South to revise its position but would say that this is a serious matter and that it views with concern the fact that a party refuses to accept the Commission's interpretation of an article of the Cease-Fire Agreement. A decision would then be taken to refer the matter to the Co-Chairmen under Article 43.

(e) Since the Seventh Interim Report is to be submitted to the Co-Chairmen shortly, the Commission would not repeat not submit a special report to the Co-Chairmen on this article but would include it in its next interim report.

(f) In the Seventh Interim Report the South's refusal to accept the Commission's interpretation of Article 14(c) would be mentioned under Article 43 in the same way as the PAVN's refusal to accept the Commission interpretation of Article 35 would be.

(g) The advantage of this plan as seen by Prasad is that at the next interim report, instead of numerous findings of non-cooperation against the South being included there would be only one reference to the Co-Chairmen under Article 43.

2. Prasad feels that short of a strong letter of this kind by the South, there is nothing to save them from findings of non-cooperation except of course if they reply to the Commission's various letters. We know on the other hand that Colonel Nam will not repeat not answer any correspondence on 14(c) until the question of interpretation of Article 14(c) is settled.

3. The obvious advantage of this plan seems to us that it would water down as much as possible the 14(c) crisis and it would at the same time permit Seventh Interim Report which will be a little less unbalanced against the South.

4. If you agree with this plan we can inform the Indians that we agree to sound out the Vietnamese provided the plan becomes an official Indian Delegation one. At this point we could also approach the UK.

REDUCTION OF COMMISSION ACTIVITIES

Prasad called and gave me an outline of the way the Indian Delegation was thinking. He said that they had considered at first heading for maximum reduction but were not of the opinion that there would be considerable difficulty at this time in bringing about any reductions for which the Cease-Fire Agreement explicitly requires unanimous approach or reference to the Co-Chairmen, such is the weakness of the plan mentioned in our telegram 26 February 5.† The Indians feel that we should concentrate on those things which we can do in our own right as a Commission and which do not repeat not require unanimous approval.

2. The plan would be to effect reductions by stages along the following lines: stage one, as an economy measure, eliminate wireless communication to those teams which were not repeat overly active. This would not repeat not affect main Hanoi-Saigon links or links to demilitarized zone. This proposal would, in addition to saving money and personnel, have the effect of removing sense of urgency from day to day team operations and would allow for more leisurely consideration of their problems. Stage two, which would be one in conjunction with stage one, would be to eliminate one team officer from most of the two-man teams. During stage three, as a result of stages one and two, we would of necessity have to revise duties of teams which had lost a member and this revision would probably have most effect on mobile elements of teams. Frequency of control would have to be reduced, and this would soften the effect of the time notice restrictions imposed by the South; it would ease the land transport problem they have. Stage four — this stage is somewhat in the future, but with team activities greatly reduced the scene might be set for consideration of elimination of certain teams.

3. The three above stages could be brought about by the Commission without reference to the parties or to the Co-Chairmen. This seems to be a definite advantage, since it probably would not repeat not be very useful at this time to bring the Co-Chairmen together for consultation, or to get involved in arguments with the parties.

4. Each stage would be sponsored by the Indian Delegation after necessary consultations with Canadian and Polish Commissioners and would be put up as complete proposals and would not repeat not deal with each team individually. This to avoid any possibility that the Pole might agree with one then (argue?) on another.

5. The plan would not repeat not affect fixed teams at Saigon and Haiphong, nor would plan affect any mobile team which would be dealt with as separate issues. As long as we want to keep Phuc Hoa on the books we probably would be obliged to maintain Locninh as a balance.

6. As a further economy, Indians would suggest elimination of all special air services in South Vietnam and would make use of commercial aircraft. A certain number of seats would be permanently booked for Commission couriers and movement of officers etc. as there are no repeat no commercial airlines operating in North Vietnam special air service in effect at present would remain.

7. The above represents Indian thought on the matter and they seem convinced that they can bring it off if they have our support. They have indicated that they are prepared to take action on a majority position if necessary. This is heartening, since the last time we sounded out the Poles they were against reduction, and there has been no repeat no indication that their attitude has changed.

8. It would appear that we will not repeat not make much ground if attempting to hold out for maximum reduction. The Indian proposal appears to go a long way towards meeting our plan and, further, sets the stage for the possible realization of our plan. It leaves the Cease-Fire Agreement intact and this should deal with our concern about the North requiring some special undertaking. It allows us to keep Phuc Hoa on the books for the time being at any rate. As to the other side of the sheet, it will probably mean that (we?) will have to produce a third element for fixed team Saigon, although it may be possible to offset this with a third element in Haiphong.

9. It is difficult to know what the Poles will demand for all this and equally difficult to know how far the Indians will go along with Polish demands. However, it is quite possible that the Poles will want to rid themselves of Phuc Hoa and we may lose out on this in the end.

10. Taking all in all, it would appear that their proposal will go a long way towards meeting our aim and that the "withering away" process which this scheme would set in train might ultimately pay dividends.

11. I would appreciate your views as soon as possible.

VIETNAM: SUBVERSION, SABOTAGE AND ESPIONAGE

Your letter under reference confirms our previous inclination to favour reversion to our support of the original report (our telegram Y 46 of February 11†). You have already made substantial concessions in order to move towards ground on which Indians stood only to have them move further away once you had arrived at what was formerly common ground. To continue moving with the Indians would result in Commission completely absolving itself from charge of failing to give consideration to South's complaints concerning subversion, sabotage and espionage and this would not be an accurate or satisfactory conclusion.

2. As there appears to be no chance that Indians will accept a set of criteria for weighing Southern complaints of Vietminh subversion, sabotage and espionage, we should not consider ourselves bound to make further attempts to reach agreement with them. Instead we should, as suggested in paragraph 9 of your letter 32, seek to have a review of the treatment accorded by the Commission to such complaints included in the Seventh Interim Report; if necessary to form part of a minority Canadian report. If, as you suspect, Poles will not support new Indian report, although for different reasons than ours, the resulting deadlock should make it easier for you to attract attention to the situation in the Seventh Interim Report.

3. We are inclined to agree with you that a deadlock in the Commission resulting in no report might be the happiest outcome that could emerge right now because of:

(a) The South's present reluctance to have mobile teams sent out where they might run into 14(c) cases. It would indeed be an anomaly for them to refuse permission to allow teams to investigate complaints from them.

(b) Opportunities which might be afforded to Poles and Indians, if teams were sent out, to twist evidence to disprove Southern allegations. Team reports might even prove some 14(c) violation on part of South especially if subversion investigations were linked with PAVN complaints under Article 14(c).

(c) Improbability of Commission moving to a decision concerning such complaints on the basis of documentary evidence alone. As you indicate in your paragraph 12 North could be counted on to match any documentation South could ever furnish.

4. For reasons outlined in your paragraph 14 we are hopeful that by maintaining our support of the original report, we might succeed in shaping the record to our advantage. The Commission would continue to do nothing about a whole category of Southern complaints of violations which, if actually investigated by the Commission, might actually tend to operate against the South. This would not prevent us, however, from using the whole question of subversion, sabotage and espionage as a major argument in the shaping of the record when the final report on Commission activities is made. It would seem useful to be able to argue that, although the Commission has been zealous in prosecuting enquiries into complaints under Article 14(c), it has not shown the same readiness to consider complaints of subversion, sabotage and espionage. We would suggest therefore that you should try to have the Commission remain impotent on this question.

5. We would be grateful for your views on what action we might take should the Poles, by chance, support the Indians' attempt to have the Commission adopt the latest Indian watered-down report. Do you think it would be feasible to argue that its adoption would in fact constitute an amendment or addition to the provisions of the agreement and would therefore seem to fall under the terms of paragraph 2 of Article 41 which states that such recommendations must be adopted unanimously? Refusal by us to support the report would probably lead to a reference to the Co-Chairmen (although paragraph 2 of Article 43 provides for reports to the Co-Chairmen only when the Commission does not reach unanimity in cases provided for in Article 42) and it would seem reasonable to expect that, under present circumstances, the Co-Chairmen would not be able to reach a decision where the Commission had failed. Our desired deadlock would therefore continue.

VIETNAM: INDIAN APPROACH TO 14(C) INVESTIGATIONS

We agree that Prasad's plan would save the South from numerous findings of non-cooperation under Article 25. You should, therefore, take the first suitable opportunity to call on the appropriate Vietnamese officials to explain the plan and try to obtain their effective cooperation. We think the suggestion mentioned in paragraph 2 of our telegram Y 53† should be given to the Vietnamese privately without mentioning it to the Indians. We hope that the South Vietnamese will see the advantages in this plan and will send an appropriate and adequate letter to the Commission.

2. We are pleased at the attitude displayed by the Indians but think that Vietnamese should proceed with the type of letter suggested whether the plan becomes an official Indian Delegation one or not. You may inform your U.K. colleagues about the plan after you have had Vietnamese reaction.

VIETNAM: REDUCTION OF COMMISSION ACTIVITIES

We agree that Indian proposal will go a long way to meeting our preliminary reduction aims and that the "withering away" process which their scheme would set in train should ultimately pay dividends. You may tell Indians we will cooperate in their plan to effect reductions by stages as outlined in your paragraph 2 although we would hope that stage 4 would not be too far in the future.

2. We fail to see how Indian insistence on adding a third element to fixed team in Saigon is in keeping with their wish to achieve reductions and we would hope that they would not insist on this. However, if this is the price we must pay to achieve reductions at other points we might consider it on the understanding that it is only a temporary addition and should be subject to review in a short time; say three months. We will be sending you separate views concerning the mobile team at Phuc Hoa.

3. We continue to be encouraged by Kaul's apparent wish to try to effect economies, both financial and personnel, in Commission operations and think we should cooperate fully with him towards this end. You will have seen from Delhi telegram 80 of February 21† that he apparently has the backing of the Indian External Affairs Department in his objectives. 14(C) PRASAD PLAN

Since the despatch of our telegram 38 March 5† we have had 3 days of intense activity.

2. On Wednesday March 6, we received word from Cannon that the South Vietnamese letter reiterating their stand on 14(c) had been received at the Saigon office and that Menon, Indian Saigon representative, had wired this info to the Indian Delegation in Hanoi. Seens saw Prasad and as a result of his conversation it became clear that the Indians had altered their tactics and now intended to carry out their plan in two phases. Phase one would be to deal with the consolidated list of 26 outstanding 14(c) cases which was on the agenda for Friday March 8, and phase two would be to deal with the South's letter of March 6 at a later date. At this stage their reasons for doing this were not repeat not too clear.

3. We went to see Kaul on Thursday, March 7, and indicated that we had had word of the South's letter from our Saigon representative and suggested that the time had come to broaden the issue and in view of the South's letter, to deal with 14(c) as a whole and forget for the moment the 26 individual cases. Kaul's reaction was that since the 26 cases were on the agenda as an item we would have to deal with this as such. Since no repeat no letter from the South had been officially received in Hanoi, he did not repeat not see why or how their issue would be broadened. During this conversation I made no repeat no mention of the Prasad plan; nor did Kaul, but I had the feeling that he knew that I knew that he knew about the Prasad plan. I thought it wise, however, not repeat not to implicate Prasad at this stage. I left it with Kaul that it was my intention to bring up the South Vietnamese letter at the meeting as it seemed futile to us to continue dealing with a series of individual cases when the problem was more deeply rooted, and that the time had come to examine the fundamental question of the interpretation of the article itself.

4. Later in the day there were further conversations with Prasad. Prasad made the point that the Pole could easily take the stand that as far as they knew, the Commission had not repeat not received any letter from the South, that in any case consideration of this letter was not repeat not on the agenda and that in consequence it was irrelevant to the problem of the day which was to decide what to do in these 26 cases where the South had sent no repeat no reply to the Commission's letters. At this point Prasad produced the first formula for dealing (with?) the item. It consisted in dealing with these 26 cases in one package deal, writing a letter to the South, drawing their attention to the fact that they had not repeat not replied to Commission's letters and that this was hardly co-operation and assistance under Article 25. The inconvenience with this formula, as we saw it, was that it opened the door to future (cases?) of non-cooperation under Article 25. Prasad said further that he thought he could persuade the Polish Delegation to go along with such a line.

5. The following morning, March 8, I went to see Kaul prior to the meeting to have one final talk with him and to reiterate my intention to broaden the issue and bring into the discussion the South's letter of March 6. It was during their conversation that for the first time it became evident that the revised Prasad plan was the Kaul plan. Kaul told me that the Pole had informed him that he was unable to accept the Indian suggestion and would insist on dealing with the cases under 3 headings: (a) cases which (group corrupt) Article 43; (b) cases of violations of Article 14(c) or of non-cooperation under Article 25; and (c) cases where a mobile team should be despatched. I told Kaul that the only thing these cases had in common was the fact that no repeat no replies had been received to Commission letters and that India was not repeat not prepared to accept any findings of violations. Furthermore, India was not repeat not prepared to accept the categories proposed by the Pole and that rather than doing that India would insist on dealing with each case individually. Kaul then outlined his proposal which in essence was to deal with the 26 cases by sending an innocuous letter to the South and not repeat not recording any violations, and he showed me his draft proposal. He asked me not repeat not to refer to the South Vietnamese letter at this stage. He was convinced that in addition to the danger mentioned in paragraph 4 above there was the possibility that the Pole would ask for an immediate special report to be sent to the Co-Chairmen and that this request might be hard to resist at this time. Kaul then went on to say that once we had cleared the books of this item and had put the South Vietnamese letter officially on the agenda we would then be in a position to proceed with the plan. On the above basis I agreed to go along with Kaul providing he amended his proposal slightly to ensure that there could be no repeat no question of suggesting a finding of non-cooperation under Article 25.

6. The meeting started at 11:00 o'clock and Kaul introduced his proposal with an appeal to us and to the Pole to go along with him on the basis that finding violations would serve no repeat no useful purpose, and that the Commission was here to help the parties and not repeat not to sit in judgment. Szymanowski then started and went on for very nearly three quarters of an hour. He said that this was a very rare issue and that as each case differed from the other he was not repeat not prepared to deal with them under one heading. He then made his three heading proposals and called upon the Commission to express grave concern, find violations and despatch mobile teams. He took the line that the only common factor in the cases was non-receipt of replies to Commission letters, that in fact the South Vietnamese Government authorities had replied to their letter of November 17, and that this was not repeat not a matter of non-cooperation but rather one of disagreement on principle and that cooperation could stop short of agreement without in any way violating the Cease-Fire Agreement.

7. One hour later we were still deadlocked and Kaul made a long and impassioned plea for unanimous agreement to his proposal and suggested an adjournment until 6:00 p.m. hoping that by that time we and the Poles would be able to agree with his proposal.

8. I saw Kaul at 3:30 p.m. and he then came completely into the open and said that he was as anxious as anyone else to put Article 14(c) (to bed?) but that we had to clear these 26 cases off the agenda before taking the next step. By this time we were convinced that the ultimate plan was safe and that the only difference between the Indians and ourselves lay in tactics and thinking. Since it was clear that the Indian also wanted to (kill?) 14(c) I thought it was wise not repeat not to divide our forces and that it was better to wait for them, agreeing for the present to the despatch of an innocuous letter to the South and not repeat not raising now the broader issue of interpretation of 14(c). Further, since we can not repeat not bring this off alone, I agreed to go along with Kaul.

9. Kaul tabled his draft proposal, which read as follow: "A letter would be sent to the Vietnamese Mission pointing out separately in an appendix how long the cases have been pending with the Commission and expressing the concern of the Commission and asking the Mission to give the Commission all possible assistance and cooperation in terms of Article 25 and send the info called for in each case within three weeks. The Mission be further told that as the Commission did not repeat not receive all possible assistance and cooperation from the Mission it has not repeat not been able to decide these cases so far and that in the event of non-receipt of replies the Commission will have no repeat no other alternative but to treat this as a difficulty which it is unable to be solve on the spot and take such other action if necessary." Both Szymanowski and I agreed. Szymanowski attempted to have the Commission agree on a specific interpretation of the proposal whereby it would appear on the records of the meeting that this letter was the first step towards finding violations against the South. The Chairman resisted this attempt. The meeting came to a close by a unanimous acceptance of the above quoted proposal.

10. This then outlined the events leading up to our present position and as we see it this is where we stand:

(a) The Commission has cleared the books of the first consolidated list of complaints under Article 14(c) to which the South had not repeat not replied and have done so without recording any violations and without prejudicing our future action.

(b) The way is now clear to table formally the South's letter of March 6.

(c) The Prasad Plan has become the Kaul Plan.

11. The stage is now set for the next phase and we go into it with Indian and UK support.

ARTICLE 14(C)

The first two items on the agenda of the Commission meeting on Friday March 22 were the South's letters 1446 and 1448 reiterating their stand on 14(c).

2. In discussions with Kaul previous to meeting he had told me that, in view of the reference to the Co-Chairmen in the South's letter 1446, his delegation considered that a special letter on the South's stand on Article 14(c) should be sent to the Co-Chairmen.

3. I discussed the question with Sir Hugh Stephenson who felt that his government would have no repeat no objection to a special letter being sent to the Co-Chairmen on the question of Article 14(c) particularly if it contained no repeat no finding of a violation of this agreement. He also showed me Foreign Office instructions to this effect. I was also guided by the comment in your telegram YY322 dated November 22 in which you envisaged the possibility of a letter to the Co-Chairmen on the question of Article 14(c). While stressing to Kaul that we would have preferred reporting to the Co-Chairmen through the medium of the Seventh Interim Report, I said that I would be willing to accept his suggestion on the condition that the Co-Chairmen would be informed that until their advice was received the Commission should postpone further action on Article 14(c) cases. Kaul felt that a special letter was necessary to justify suspension of work on 14(c). He told me that the Polish Delegation would insist on a special report but at the same time would also insist that the Commission continue to deal with 14(c) correspondence.

4. The Indian draft letter was circulated approximately one hour before the meeting on Friday. While we found much of the draft objectionable in that it gave a one-sided summary of the correspondence between the South Vietnamese Mission and the Commission and included unsatisfactory general statements, the operative paragraph was satisfactory from our point of view. It read as follows: "The Commission would therefore be grateful if the Co-Chairmen would kindly give their consideration to this matter and advise the Commission regarding its future course of action. The Commission will however continue to accept fresh complaints, if any, under Article 14(c) but in view of the difficulties mentioned above which it is not repeat not able to resolve on the spot the Commission feels compelled to postpone further action on all cases under Article 14(c) until further advice or instructions are received from the Co-Chairmen".

5. At the March 22 meeting I said that a special communication to the Co-Chairmen tended to exaggerate the importance of 14(c) and might create a precedent for singling out other articles for similar treatment and that I preferred that the report on 14(c) should be included in the next interim report. I realize however that the Chairman wished unanimous acceptance of his proposal and in that spirit I was prepared to accept a special communication in principle. On the question of the draft itself I suggested that the latter be shortened by eliminating the history of the question about which it might be difficult to reach agreement and instead attach copies of the relevant correspondence.

6. The Polish Commissioner accepted the idea of a special report, stated that Article 14(c) was most important, proposed additions to the Indian draft which dwelt on the South's failures to send replies and vigorously opposed the suggestion that the Commission discontinue further action on Article 14(c). The Chairman then proposed that the Canadian and Polish delegates circulate their suggested decisions to the draft and suggested that the items be further considered at the next meeting.

7. Our revised draft merely referred to paragraph 2 of the letter from the Co-Chairmen to the Commission dated May 8, pointing out that it had been clear that there was a disagreement between the Government of the Republic of Vietnam and the International Commission over the interpretation and application of Article 14(c), listed the correspondence to be attached (including the various memos of the South on procedure of late 1955 and the Commission's reply on that question dated January 7, 1957). Our draft went on to take the wording of the Indian draft. The South had not repeat not accepted the unanimous views of the Commission on the interpretation of the acceptability of Article 14(c); that the Commission was therefore no repeat no longer in a position to supervise its implementation and settle the complaints under this article and that the Commission wished to bring to the notice of the Co-Chairmen this serious difficulty in its activities. Our draft ended with the operative paragraph of the Indian draft quoted above.

8. The Polish revision of the Indian draft added a number of sentences referring to scores of new complaints unanswered and the "complete lack of cooperation" on the part of the South and deleted the last sentence of the operative paragraph.

9. At the meeting yesterday morning the argument continued. Kaul was very forceful in urging that in order to give a complete picture of the situation the Co-Chairmen must be informed that the Commission was unable to take further action on Article 14(c) cases. To (group corrupt) the last sentence of the operative paragraph as suggested by the Poles would mean self deception on the part of the Commission and he hoped that the Polish Commissioner would be able to agree to the substance of this proposal. He complimented the Canadian Delegation on its concession on the question of making a special report and on its objective approach. He agreed with the point which I made that we could not repeat not logically report to the Co-Chairmen that the Commission was unable to carry out its functions under Article 14(c) and at the same time continue to deal with 14(c) items.

10. After a long discussion Kaul proposed an amendment to his operative paragraph which does not repeat not alter its practical result. The last phrase of the last sentence now reads as follows: "The Commission is not repeat not able to take any further action in cases under Article 14(c) unless these difficulties are resolved". Kaul then said that he had introduced the Indian draft of a special report to the Co-Chairmen on the condition that if he was unable to get unanimous acceptance on it or a revision of it, he would reserve the right to withdraw it. He considered that it was essential that his operative paragraph be retained. He was now wondering if indeed it would be the right course to withdraw the Indian draft. He went on to say that if unanimity were still not repeat not possible he would reserve the right to reconsider whether or not repeat not a majority decision would be the best method of dealing with the problem.

11. The Polish Commissioner asked for some time to study Mr. Kaul's amendment to his operative paragraph but gave no repeat no indication that he would in the end agree to it, as he continued to maintain that the Commission should not repeat not suspend 14(c) activities. A further discussion will be held on the items at a special meeting of the Commission on April 2 in Hanoi.

12. It now appears that the Indians might possibly be willing to go ahead with a majority report to the Co-Chairmen on the question of 14(c). We hope that they will agree to a letter in simple terms such as we have proposed and we are cheered to know that they will insist that the Commission should not repeat not take further action on 14(c) cases.[56]

FUTURE OF THE INDOCHINA COMMISSIONS

We have made a review of the work of the three Commissions in Indochina to see what can be done to reduce activities and personnel there in the next few months. We have consulted our Commissioners on the ground, sounded out the Indians and had the benefit of discussions with Bruce Williams and Brigadier Moncel. Our review deals separately with the situations in the three countries and then sums up with some general observations.

Cambodia

2. When Mr. Nehru visited Ottawa in December we gave Sir R. Pillai a memorandum[57] setting out our reasons for renewing the arguments for the dissolution of the Cambodian Commission that had originally been stated by Arnold Smith when he tabled a resolution on the subject in the Commission in May, 1956. On February 6 Mr. Desai gave the Indian reply[58] to Mr. Reid. He said that legally the Commission still had a responsibility under Article 7 to supervise Cambodia's undertaking not to enter into a military alliance or solicit foreign aid in war material or instructors except for the effective defence of its territory. Their interpretation of Article 25 requires unanimous agreement in the Commission to reduce activities and this can only be effected "in regard to the development of the situation in Vietnam and Laos." Mr. Desai pointed out that the Cambodian Government wanted the Commission to stay and it could be assumed that the other party — the Vietminh — would also. The Poles were also opposed to dissolution. The Indians were therefore not prepared to support our resolution on dissolution but they would help us with reduction.

On April 11, 1957, the Commission agreed unanimously on the text of a "more factual and shorter" letter to the co-chairmen which concluded "that the Commission was not able to take any effective action on cases under Article 14(c) unless its difficulties were resolved." [58] Voir/See Document 710.

3. Mr. Reid's comment on his interview with Desai was:

"It seems to me clear from my conversation with Desai that if we continue to keep our dissolution resolution on ice the Indians are prepared to use their best efforts to have the Commission reduced to next to nothing."

4. We have thought that since there is a supportable legal argument for the continuation of the Commission, since both signatories of the Cease-fire Agreement want the Commission to stay and since the Indians and Poles are opposed to dissolution at this time we have the alternatives of:

(a) walking out of the Commission, or

(b) working for the time being with the Indians to secure maximum reduction of activities and personnel.

There would be disadvantages in walking out. It would be regarded as an undemocratic procedure for getting our way. A somewhat similar tactic employed when Dr. Patterson was temporarily withdrawn when the UN Temporary Commission on Korea voted against us to observe elections in South Korea in 1948 was quickly reversed in the face of popular outcry. Our walking out of the Commission in Cambodia would create a precedent for the Indians to walk out of UNEF.

5. Further efforts at reduction would be the more prudent course. You will be aware that the Commission has already eliminated the four fixed teams outside Phnom Penh and reduced total strength from 307 to 186. The Canadian Delegation is down to a total of thirteen now including an Acting Commissioner (EAO-5), Political Adviser (FSO-1), Military Adviser (Col.) two majors and administrative personnel. If our current proposal to eliminate fixed team Phnom Penh is accepted we will be able to eliminate two more officers.

6. If this withering away process can be continued with Indian cooperation we are hoping that we may, in due course, have the work of the Canadian Delegation in Cambodia taken over on a part-time basis by a Canadian representative outside Cambodia who might go to Phnom Penh once a month for a pro forma Commission meeting. We think that there would be transportation difficulties and problems of conflicting pre-occupations in the way of the Commissioners in Vientiane or Hanoi taking on this additional assignment at this stage. We are, however, making enquiries. A solution which would avoid these problems would be to have a Canadian Ambassador in Saigon accredited as both Ambassador and Commissioner in Cambodia. He could go up to Phnom Penh from time to time to attend meetings and we might hope that this might be eventually regarded as a sufficient symbol of the continuing interest of Commission governments in the maintenance of the Geneva Agreements.

Laos

7. Although agreements en principe were concluded last August and last December looking to the unification of Laos, in fact there has been no agreement on the detailed procedures and timetable for implementation. This means that Pathet Lao and Royal Government forces still face each other in the provinces of Sam Neua and Phongsaly. There is only an armistice — no peace. While this situation remains, or until the question of supervision of the implementation of any settlement (particularly the military aspect) is decided there is a continuing task for the Commission to perform in Laos.

8. It has been our view that the Commission in Laos has three valuable functions to fulfil:

(a) supervise the ceasefire;

(b) by the presence of its teams in the northern provinces discourage the open intervention of the Vietminh there;

(c) give moral support to the Royal Government in the political negotiations.

While Campbell has reported to us on political developments in Laos, because this is the backdrop against which the Commission must play, he has been pretty successful in keeping the Commission from meddling in things that aren't its business.

8. We are going to make another effort to get agreement on elimination of some of the teams outside the areas where the two armies face each other. In the past the Poles have argued that they will only agree to eliminating a team in the South if we agree to eliminate one in Pathet Lao territory. Decisions to reduce activities must be adopted unanimously, according to Article 39, but we may be able to make some progress if we can get the Indians to advance the proposals.

9. We now have three Foreign Service Officers in Laos — an FSO-5 and 2 FSO-2's. We are thinking of transferring one to Saigon to replace Cannon.

Vietnam

10. The biggest and most important operation is in divided Vietnam where the 300,000-man Vietminh Army and developed agent organization still pose overt and covert threats to the security of South Vietnam and neighbouring areas. The South Vietnam Government has told us that they want the Commission to stay as a deterrent to Vietminh aggression and that they value the role we have been playing on the Commission. The Americans, Australians, British and French have also assured us that they want to see the Commission continue. The value of the International Commission was reassessed only last month by the SEATO powers when they decided it was more important to keep the Commission in being than to bring South Vietnam into SEATO in defiance of the Geneva Agreement.

11. Of course we think that the essential tasks of serving as a symbol of the Geneva Agreement, maintaining stability and watching over the demarcation line at the 17th parallel could now be done with a substantially reduced Commission establishment. Our problem has been how to secure this reduction in the face of Vietminh and Polish determination to preserve the whole fabric of the Armistice supervision machinery set out in the Ceasefire Agreement and the unwillingness of the Indians to do anything that would modify the Agreement without the concurrence of both parties. In effecting reduction we have not wanted all the blame to be placed all at once on the South as this would be a bad blow to their improving relations with India and the other so-called neutral states of the area.

12. Fortunately, financial pressure from the British and French who contribute to the expenses of the Commissions, has coincided with pressure from the Indian Defence Ministry for personnel reductions at the time of the appointment of a new and more practical-minded Indian Commissioner, Mr. Kaul. He has already cut down the Indian Signals Regiment so that communications with some of the quieter teams will be slower and they will therefore generate less business. He has collaborated with our Delegation to bring an end to investigations of alleged abuses of democratic freedoms under Article 14(c) which will enable us to eliminate one FSO and permit the reduction of 6 officer teams to 3 officer teams by cutting out the mobile investigation elements.

13. The remaining substantial responsibility of the Commission fixed teams is to check on the import of war materials and entry of military personnel. Brigadier Moncel says that Mr. Kaul insists on remaining within the four corners of the Armistice Agreement. He suggests, however, that we might get the Indians to go along with a plan to write letters to the North and South asking them to agree to restrict war material imports and personnel entries to say 2 ports each. Brigadier Moncel argues that it is wise to play along with the Indians while they show their present disposition to move in the direction we would like to go. He says that if we try to go too quickly we may trip.

14. Our thinking has been that we should aim at small Commission headquarters staffs in Hanoi and Saigon, a mobile team to serve as a warning bell in case of any aggression at the 17th parallel, and possibly one or two arms control teams for some time in the North and South.

Conclusions

15. Certain general conclusions have emerged from our restudy of this question:

(a) All the Indochinese Governments wish the Commissions to continue.

(b) Our friends (U.S., U.K., France, Australia) wish the Commissions to continue.

(c) The Indians and Poles are disposed to continue.

(d) Although it is evident from a practical point of view that the Cambodian Commission has completed its essential task it is legally arguable that the Cambodian Commission has continuing responsibilities. The three agreements are tied together by parallel articles which require consultation among them about reduction of activities having regard to developments in the other countries. These articles also require unanimity.

(e) Walking out of any of the Commissions would lay us open to the charge of undemocratic procedure to gain our ends and establish precedents which might cause us problems elsewhere, e.g. UNEF.

(f) Financial pressure is bringing about a review of establishments by the Indians.

(g) A number of reductions have been made already and others are being discussed.

(h) The External Affairs personnel requirement is shrinking. We now require two good FSO-5's as Commissioners in Vietnam and Laos; two good FSO 3 or 4's for Hanoi and Saigon; one less active FSO 4 or 5 as Acting Commissioner in Phnom Penh and the rest are FSO-1's receiving good training.

(i) While the Delegations remain we get helpful political and intelligence reports on the area, but our Delegations have been successful in preventing the Commissions from spreading themselves.

15. We think that our personnel in Indochina continue to perform a useful stabilizing role that is still valued by our friends and that on this account we would be best advised to persist in our efforts to progressively cut down on the activities and establishments of the Commissions in cooperation with the Indians.[59]

ELIMINATION OF FIXED TEAM SITES

We consider that the desirable objective of consolidation of teams in Phnom Penh can be best argued on practical rather than legal grounds.

Political Arguments

2. The practical arguments in addition to those set out in your resolution and statement, seem to us to be chiefly these:

(a) The greater part of the work of the Cambodia Commission has been completed. Remaining duties of fixed teams in checking entry of military personnel and materiel and making investigations can be satisfactorily conducted by a consolidated team in Phnom Penh.

(b) It is undesirable in terms of broad precedents for international supervision of armistices for Commissions to remain longer or in greater strength than minimum required for discharge of their essential functions. Overstaying may give rise to suspicions of Commission and also of disinterestedness of governments concerned which would reflect adversely on future discussions of use of International Commissions for Supervision and Control of armistice arrangements, etc. A broad argument like this with a hint at Polish subversive activity and Sihanouk's November letter to Wolniak seems to us to be more appropriate than pressing too hard on narrow grounds of Polish transmitter at Kratie which we would have difficulty in proving and which might be used with too much force by Cambodians if it came to their ears.

(c) Decision of Vietnam Commission to relocate fixed team from Muong Sen at Con Cuong on grounds that functions can be adequately performed at latter point where accommodation and facilities more satisfactory has established a useful precedent for consolidation.

(d) Commission's authority and prestige in the discharge of its remaining functions will remain high with Cambodian government and people only if it is evident that Commission is realistically cutting its operations and size in accordance with these limited remaining functions. Unfortunate tension would be created if Cambodian government felt compelled to request Commission to wind up its operations more quickly than it is now doing.

(e) Your proposed resolution calls for no reduction in activities. Adequate provision is made through reference to transport and communications for consolidated team at Phnom Penh to perform remaining functions of fixed teams.

Legal Arguments

3. Our comments on the legal arguments that may be adduced to support the practical considerations outlined above follow:

(a) The distinction between reduction of establishment and reduction of activities (over which Poles may claim a veto under Article 25) has some validity. We think it quite in keeping with the concept of the three armistice agreements to anticipate a progressive reduction in establishments as the number, nature and importance of remaining functions decreases. This is consistent with the publicly stated view of the Minister that Canada will retain representation on the Commissions in Indochina only so long as there is a constructive job to be done.

(b) We agree with paragraph 8 of your 238 of December 9 that an argument might be made under Article 12(2) that since points of location of the fixed teams may be altered by agreement between the Government of Cambodia and the International Commission such changes do not require the unanimity mentioned in paragraphs 20 (2), 21 or 25. Hence if majority agreed to consolidation of teams in Phnom Penh and Cambodian government agreed other member could not properly challenge the validity of this agreement.

(c) The precedents mentioned in paragraph 2 and 3 of your 250 of December 23 whereby changes in locations of fixed teams in Laos and Vietnam were made without consulting other Commissions might be cited to support argument that relocation or consolidation of team sites does not fall under Article 25 relating to reduction in activities in which such consultation appears mandatory.

Tactics

4. We agree to the plan in paragraph 6 of your 254 that you might accept progressive reduction as a practical provisional compromise. Would it not be better to have Indian introduce amendment to your resolution rather than introduce amendment yourself?

5. We wonder whether discussing proposed resolution with Cambodians at this stage might not create an embarrassing pressure on the Commission. On the other hand we see value in our getting credit with the Cambodians for this initiative and in ensuring that they understand broad purposes of resolution and considerations involved in its discussion in the Commission. This would appear the more desirable if there has been or may be some leak about your resolution. Informing Indians that you think that the resolution should be discussed with the Cambodians possibly with reference to need for understanding and cooperation in transfer of functions of fixed teams might be a useful way of putting pressure on Indians. We think that you are probably in best place to weigh these considerations and determine tactics accordingly.

6. In regard to voting we accept the tactics you propose in paragraph 9 of your telegram 254.

7. Delhi: Please discuss with Desai if possible the resolution and statement contained in Phnom Penh telegrams 230 and 231 of December 7 repeated to you and considerations outlined in paragraph 2 in particular of this telegram. Please emphasize our desire to see fixed teams consolidated in Phnom Penh. Please ascertain how far Indians are prepared to go now and later.

REDUCTION

1. At this morning's Commission meeting Wolniak started by saying the Polish government would agree to eliminate the Kampot team at the end of January on condition that no further consideration or discussion of any further reduction take place until March. Wolniak would make no commitment about the stand he would then take on reduction. General Kirpal and I indicated that we would never accept such a cynical bargain. The Pole then suggested that informal talks might take place later with a view to off the record discussions of a time table for further discussions. Meanwhile Wolniak said his instructions (group corrupt) acceptance of elimination of any other teams.

2. In anticipation of the meeting we had divided our December 6 resolution into four separate resolutions each referring to one of the 4 provincial teams. I introduced them and the Kampot resolution was adopted unanimously.

3. In view of paragraph three of your telegram Y183 of December 20 I did not press a vote on any of the remaining resolutions although the Indians have stated on the record that they would support us as far as Kratie is concerned. I left on the table (group corrupt) not voted on the remaining three resolutions. If I do not hear from you to the contrary I shall continue to let these stand on the agenda and may ask for a recorded vote on one or more of them if this seems likely to assist in keeping India on our side and keeping up the pressure on the Poles. Our progress on reduction is slow but this nibbling away at the establishment is nevertheless producing results. With the elimination of Kampot the Commission in Cambodia will have been brought down to about one third of its original strength as far as the teams are concerned.

4. Moreover the results in showing up to the Indians the real nature of Polish policy may prove even more important in long run especially when wind up of this Commission comes to be considered. The Pole made use of all sorts of delaying tactics and clearly demonstrated to the Indians here Polish cynicism in keeping teams in being when they are no longer required to perform Commission functions. To this extent pressing the matter as far as we have done has undoubtedly proved a useful exercise to Indian deduction. The Indian Delegation has been swinging very markedly in sympathy toward us during recent weeks and today's demonstration by the Poles (reaffirmed?) this.

5. General Kirpal and I have decided to continue to press Wolniak and begin informal talks tomorrow in an effort to smoke out Polish intentions which at the moment seem to be to stay here as long as they can and repeat the Korean NNSC stalemate. (For Hanoi and Vientiane) Our Kampot resolution has been forwarded to your Secretary General for comments. Please try to ensure that these are forthcoming as soon as possible. I trust they will consist of "no comment".

Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations of United Kingdom to High Commissioner of United Kingdom in Ottawa

TELEGRAM 375 London, February 21, 1956

CONFIDENTIAL

Following is text of Foreign Office telegram to Phnom Penh No. 108, 20th February, repeated for information to United Kingdom High Commissioner Ottawa and Saving Saigon, Vientiane, Singapore, Bangkok, Paris, Washington, Delhi. Begins.

FUTURE OF INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION IN CAMBODIA

Discussions on this subject were held with the Canadians during my visit to Ottawa. If the objective of withdrawing the Commission from Cambodia is to be achieved without prejudice to the position in Vietnam and Laos, it is important that the Cambodian government should assist in the process.

2. You should discuss the problem frankly with Prince Sihanouk on his return, making the following points,

(i) The Canadians, the Indians and ourselves are all agreed that the Commission should be withdrawn from Cambodia fairly soon.

(ii) The future of the Commissions in Vietnam and Laos is at present in doubt. We wish to see the Cease-Fire arrangements maintained and think that the Commissions in those two countries should continue if possible until some settlement is reached. The withdrawal of the Commissions and a deterioration in the situation in Vietnam and Laos might threaten the security of Cambodia. We hope therefore to achieve the withdrawal of the Commission from Cambodia without prejudicing the future of the Commissions elsewhere. In view of Polish opposition to withdrawal of the Cambodian Commission, considerable care will have to be exercised and it is important that the Cambodian government should not take any precipitate action which might damage the prospects.

(iii) If the Poles cannot be brought to agree to withdrawal of the Cambodian Commission, we are still hopeful that a means to withdraw it may be found without reconvening the Geneva Conference.

(iv) In the meantime the Cambodians can help to strengthen the Canadian and Indian arguments for withdrawal by refraining from putting new business before the Commission, and by expediting the settlement of existing business.

(v) As Article 7 of the Cease-Fire Agreement, which now provides the only important remaining tasks for the Commission, is linked in part with the attainment of a settlement in Vietnam, and as the prospect of such a settlement seems at present remote, the Commission cannot argue that the Cambodian assurances will have lapsed. But to enable the Commission to withdraw and to prevent the Vietminh from having any excuses for meddling in Cambodia, the Cambodian assurances will have to be maintained. We hope that if it should be necessary, the Cambodian government would be prepared formally to renew its assurances in respect of foreign aid in war material and military personnel, and would undertake on its own responsibility to continue to implement the corresponding provisions of the Cease-Fire Agreement so long as a settlement in Vietnam were still unattained.

3. You should discuss these instructions with the Canadian Commissioner before approaching Sihanouk and should refer to me if he does not agree on any points. Ends.

FUTURE OF THE CAMBODIAN COMMISSION DATED FEB 13

1. I have only today received your interesting telegrams Y18, 19[62] and 20,† of February 7 and 8. In view of the length of time sometimes taken by encyphering, transmitting and decyphering messages, I am not clear whether you have considered the situation reported in my 23† and 24† of January 31 (incursions from South Vietnam of armed bands apparently made up of members of the sects under Vietminh leadership), before you suggested that the U.K. representative here point out to the Cambodian government that it should avoid bringing any new business to the Commission for settlement.

2. If you had not done so before making your request to the U.K. it may be that you would wish to re-examine the situation in the light of those telegrams and other reports (e.g. Johnson's despatch 48 of February 8†), which suggest the possibility of Vietminh subversion along the Vietnamese-Cambodian border during coming months; and then to reaffirm or modify the request.

3. I myself would have hesitated in view of the uncertainty of the situation just at present and the extent of the Cambodian government's concern over relations with South Vietnam, to tell Sihanouk too categorically at this moment that he should in his own interests avoid giving any new business to the Commission. I would also, as you know, hesitate to recommend expressing any categorical Commission disinterest or lack of jurisdiction in what might just conceivably become a fairly real communist threat through subversion and armed irregulars. While the threat would be primarily against Vietnam, it might not be exclusively so, and in any case there may be a tendency for the Vietminh penetrated sects to make use of Cambodian territory as a safe-haven base from which to conduct anti-Diem operations. If such a development is indeed in the offing, the Cambodian Commission could conceivably be useful to deter it.

4. There is also the new (or rather old and hitherto forgotten) problem of the Cambodian desire to expel former communist collaborators from among the Vietnamese minority in this country (my telegram 27 February 9†). Though this problem may prove messy, I hope we may be able somehow to find some commonsense and quiet solution. But here again it might appear a little odd for the Commission to request through a third party exemption from precisely the sort of duties for which we were established.

5. On the other hand, I do think it would be useful at some suitable opportunity to urge Sihanouk not to invoke the Commission's assistance except in serious cases. We might also speak to Sihanouk about the essential distinction between the sects, which are falling increasingly under Vietminh influence, and Diem's forces; and suggest to him that for the stability of South-East Asia as a whole it would seem desirable that there should be an understanding, and (at least informal) direct contacts, between the Cambodian and South Vietnam governments. It is not in Cambodia's interests to weaken Diem since the alternative would probably be a Vietminh régime in South Vietnam; I think Sihanouk could be brought to see this. Sihanouk might also be told that the Commission's terms of reference and composition were designed to enable it to mediate between the Cambodian and the Communists. It cannot usefully get involved in disputes between the two neighbouring non-communist governments of Cambodia and South Vietnam. Sihanouk could I think be made to see that the Poles would probably try to exacerbate Cambodian-South Vietnamese relations rather than improve them.

6. I quite agree that frank discussions with Sihanouk about the situation and the future of the Commission will shortly also be desirable. Might it not, however, be useful that these discussions, whether initiated by the British or ourselves, or both of us in parallel, should be postponed for a couple of weeks

(a) to allow some clarification of Cambodian-South Vietnam relations and a mature assessment by ourselves of the threat, if any composed by Communist bands along the frontier; and

(b) to try to see clearly in our own minds how best to handle the various problems which we may encounter in the next few months?

7. It would, for example, be useful to have here some sort of idea what way is expected to be found to withdraw the Commission from Cambodia in a few months if the Poles oppose this. If, as seems likely, it proves inexpedient to use the argument I had had in mind earlier, about automatic expiry of the Cambodian obligations in July 1956, then as presently advised I do not see how we can avoid recognizing that a wind-up of the Commission is a "reduction of activities" in the most absolute sense, and hence subject to a veto under Article 25. Should I draw from your statement (in paragraph 9 of your telegram Y18) that this is a Polish legal view, the conclusion that we might have some alternative legal argument. Or would we contemplate resigning.

8. Incidentally, I have not received any reply to my "principles or agents" telegram 1 of January 4.† At the time I of course had in mind that possibility of wind-up even without Polish concurrence by a Canadian-Indian ruling that the Cambodian obligations under the Cease-Fire Agreement had expired, which would have automatically entailed the wind-up of the Commission charged with supervising implementation of the obligations. But even without the automatic expiration the question may prove not entirely academic. Wolniak, in a discussion a few weeks ago with Kirpal and myself, made it clear that in his view the Commission could not itself decide to withdraw, but could at most only so recommend to the Geneva Powers, who would decide. Such a procedure if accepted by the Indians and ourselves might make it fairly easy for the Communists to delay a decision for several months, without formally taking the onus before the Cambodian government of vetoing a wind-up. It could also, I suppose, facilitate a Communist hold-out for a reconvened Geneva Conference with Cambodia included on the agenda.

9. I myself would not yet give up hope that we and the Indians might eventually succeed in persuading the Poles to concur in a wind-up this summer: but I would not be sufficiently sure of this to want to make a promise to Sihanouk without some idea how we would implement it if the Poles did refuse to go along.

10. I am also a little doubtful about the suggestion to the U.K. authorities reported in paragraph 10 of your telegram Y18, which also put forward to me in paragraph 3 of your telegram Y21† [...][63] that the U.K. Ambassador and I would advise Sihanouk to [...] assurances that he will accept responsibility for conti[...]tation of those portions of the Geneva Agreement which [...] in force until there is a settlement in Vietnam. Since no settlement is expected in Vietnam in the foreseeable future, this would amount to a restriction of indefinite applicability. Even though it may be unwise to state explicitly that the servitude has expired, might we not leave the question of the duration veiled in a decent obscurity?

11. It is, of course, conceivable that when a wind-up of the Cambodian Commission is seriously discussed the price of Polish acquiescence might be some continuing undertaking by the Cambodians. If so, we might want to recommend that Cambodia give appropriate assurances. But it seems unnecessary to give away such a concession in advance of a Polish quid pro quo. And, if, before it is necessary we persuade Sihanouk that such a declaration would be in Cambodian interests, then he might make it too soon in one of his ultra-neutral-list orations, and we would thereby lose such bargaining value as it has.

12. We must also consider the effect on Sihanouk of a U.K. or Canadian prompting to renew his devotion to Article 7. The actual terms of Article 7 are, of course, not really restrictive, if given any kind of normal legal interpretation. But in practice the Article, as you know, has been mightily stretched. India's sleight-of-hand interpretation of Article 7 began innocuously, or even constructively, with the thesis that the Treaty (rather than Eden's promise to Chou En Lai) precludes Cambodian membership in SEATO — (which would have been a bad idea anyway as it would greatly increase tension while contributing nothing to SEATO strength). But the interpretation has gone a long way since then. You will recall, for example, the Indian-Polish contentions last summer about MAA again, the reference in Article 7 to "instructors" is tacitly taken in some quarters to preclude American but not necessarily Indian military training etc.

13. The real problem about continuing obligations is that Parthasarathi, last spring and summer, seems to have scared Sihanouk by the fuss over the U.S.-Cambodian military aid agreement, and to have convinced the Prince that in effect Cambodia has a Geneva Treaty obligation to pursue a policy of neutralism. Sihanouk has several times (including I understand in speeches during his recent trip to China) referred to this Geneva obligation to be neutral. The distinction between military neutrality and political neutralism has been blurred out of sight, and clever Indian diplomacy has used its interpretation of an alleged neutralist undertaking in the Geneva Agreement to build a very far-reaching edifice: this edifice seems to imply that Cambodia must balance co-operation with the West by more or less equal co-operation with the Communists (e.g. no exchange of representatives with Saigon unless a Hanoi Mission is also allowed here).

The material in square brackets is illegible in the badly damaged original.

14. I hope things will not go this far, but it is just conceivable that the Communists may, with Indian assistance, pull off a sort of diplomatic end-run in Indo-China. Vietnamese or Chinese Communist missions here, followed perhaps by Soviet or Chinese offers of economic and technical assistance (which "it would be unneutral to refuse") might allow the development via the Vietnamese and Chinese minorities in Cambodia of a good base for communism penetration of South Vietnam.

15. On the other hand, it is possible that Sihanouk may revert, at least for a while, to a less "neutralist" line by improving his relations with the United States, and (though much of the responsibility for bad relations may lie in Saigon and Bangkok) by trying to improve them with South Vietnam and Thailand. Sihanouk has a propensity to treat foreign policy as a pendulum act, veering excitingly most of the time to one side or the other and rarely being at dead centre.

16. Incidentally I am not suggesting that the only basis for Cambodian neutralism is the Geneva Agreement. Nor would I suggest that neutrality is necessarily a bad policy for this country — indeed we in this delegation have occasionally toyed with the idea that there may be all-round advantage in a neutralisation of Cambodia guaranteed by India and Communist China and perhaps also by the Western Great Powers. But for Canada and the United Kingdom to urge Sihanouk to reiterate his devotion to Article 7, without clarifying the confused interpretation of its implications which he has been led by the Indians to accept, and which conflict seriously with the present United States policy of trying to build up this area's defensive strength, might be open to misunderstanding.

17. I hope you do not mind these comments, which may well be prompted by insufficient information or understanding on my part. I have not abandoned the recommendation for an early wind-up which I submitted in my "latter ends" telegram of December 24; but I would like to feel satisfied that the subversion threat is not sufficiently serious to call into play the qualification in paragraph 20 of that December 24 message. I feel unable to assess (now?) with much confidence the real extent, if any, of the Vietminh threat along the South Vietnamese-Cambodian border. Naturally this depends in part on the prospects for the future of the Vietnam Commission. But if we can establish that Communist capabilities along the frontier are not too great, then their intentions can perhaps be ignored as far as the Cambodian Commission is concerned.

18. I hope that within a few weeks the situation may be sufficiently clarified in most of these points to allow us to revert with confidence to some settled line on the future of this Commission. But until we are reasonably confident in our own minds of the policy that is in the Cambodian and general interest, we are unlikely to be able to persuade the Indians, and if we cannot carry them we are unlikely to get a neat solution.

FUTURE OF CAMBODIAN COMMISSION

1. Dated February 23. The British Ambassador called on me yesterday and showed me a copy of telegram 108 of February 20 to him from the Foreign Office, London, which was repeated to Ottawa. You will no doubt get a copy from Earnscliffe. Heppel was instructed to have a frank discussion with Sihanouk on lines closely based on those put forward in your telegram Y18 of February 7. However, Heppel was asked to discuss his instructions with me before approaching Sihanouk and to refer back if there were any points on which I did not agree.

2. When I received on February 13 your telegram Y18 of February 7, I had a number of misgivings and dictated a telegram of comments to you. However, I held up the transmission of that telegram partly to have time to think things over, and partly to see whether there were also second thoughts in Ottawa or London as a result of our various telegrams reporting the troubled situation between Cambodia and Vietnam. The fact that Heppel had not received any instructions for two weeks after the date of your telegram Y18 encouraged me to think that you and the British might in fact be giving further consideration to the question and I continued therefore to delay transmission of my comments.

3. When, however, Heppel called on February 22 I felt I should show him my draft telegram of comments and see to what extent he shared my feeling that some further consideration was desirable. He shared it fully, he told me. Indeed, Heppel tells me that he believes that if in the present circumstances he tried to persuade Sihanouk not to refer matters to the Commission, he expects that Sihanouk would reject this advice and claim that his small country needs international protection.

4. Heppel and I discussed in some detail my rather lengthy comments of February 13, and Heppel is in general agreement with them. I am therefore now transmitting to you, in my immediately preceding telegram, the message of observations which I had drafted on February 13. I understand that Heppel is telegraphing along somewhat similar lines to the Foreign Office.

5. Apart from the considerations mentioned in my February 13 comments, there is also the point that so far as I know the Indians are not yet in agreement that the Commission should be withdrawn soon from Cambodia. General Das has, as you know, been hesitant about reduction of teams, though I think he is gradually coming around on this questions. He says, however, that he has no instructions on withdrawal of the Commission. The last word we here have had from Delhi on the question is in Escott Reid's telegram 54 to Ottawa of January 19,† in which Desai opposed reduction of the Battambang and Svay

Rieng teams and took the line that "The Cambodian Commission would have to continue in existence until the future of the Vietnam Commission was resolved". I do not know whether you have latest information about Indian views or whether you have been relying on the agreement which I had reached with Kirpal and Wolniak (my telegram 9 of January 10, 1956†), to make joint recommendations to our three governments. General Kirpal has gone, the Indian government has not so far as I know replied to his recommendation, and in any case Wolniak broke the agreement. Here again I hope to win General Das around to our views, but it is I fear too soon as yet to count on Indian concurrence.

6. Naturally it was only very reluctantly that I expressed doubts about the line worked out in the Canadian-U.K. talks in Ottawa for Heppel to put up to Prince Sihanouk. However, the resultant delay would I think in any case have been unavoidable, as the Prince became ill a few days ago and all appointments for the next 10 days have been cancelled. It would hardly be worth while seeing anyone else on the subject we have in mind: and there is unlikely to be an opportunity for serious talks with the Prince until after the coronation celebrations (March 2 to 8).

7. Heppel and I are both awaiting further instructions.

A WAY HOME?

1. I have been giving some thought to possible methods of winding up the Cambodian Commission without relying on the argument which I had put forward to you in my "latter" telegram of December 27, that Cambodian obligations, and therefore the Commission's terms of reference, expire automatically in July 1956.

2. It is, of course, possible that Poland may oppose wind-up to the end. If they do, we may eventually have to get tough in one way or another. But it is, I think, conceivable that the Poles may be persuaded to be reasonable in this matter. I am, for example, heartened by the extent to which, despite earlier Polish obduracy, our efforts to reduce teams have produced results and have indeed gradually obtained Polish agreement, however reluctant. In any case, I would like to try to exploit the present momentum here. Moreover, if it should turn out that the Poles remain unreasonable so that we have to consider more drastic action, a clear record of their reaction to reasonable proposals will in any case be a desirable preliminary. For this and other reasons, therefore, I am inclined to think that this is a situation for (group corrupt) proposals. There is, or should be, an old Canadian adage: "when in doubt, play it straight".

3. I would like, therefore, if you agree, to introduce in the Commission a resolution calling for wind-up of the Commission on (say) April 30, 1956. The date itself could be negotiable and could if necessary be put off for one or even two months.

4. The resolution might have a few preambulatory clauses recognizing whereas that Cambodia has well discharged her obligations under the Cease-Fire Agreement; that she has obtained effective sovereignty over the whole of her national territory; that her electoral obligations were duly discharged, as the Commission recognizes in its Fourth Report;[64] and that conditions of political and social stability have been achieved. Possibly these somewhat laudatory preambles may be useful in suggesting a distinction between the Cambodian situation on the one hand and that in Laos and Vietnam on the other, to diminish likelihood that winding up this Commission would jolt our sister Commissions. The flattery might also help in obtaining Cambodian government approval of the idea, which could be important in its possible influence on the Indians and Poles. Such sentences might also make it more difficult for the Indians to oppose wind up without risk of offence to the Cambodians. Finally, the laudatory preambles could, if necessary, be sacrificed, providing the Poles would accept the operative conclusion that we recognize that our task is accomplished and go home.

5. We might also, if you agree, include a preambular paragraph recognizing that the PAVN as the other party to the Cambodian Cease-Fire Agreement, has correctly discharged its obligations thereunder. Conceivably an international recognition of good Geneva behaviour would appeal to the Vietminh: and it would not do much damage in the context of the Cambodian Agreement. It may go somewhat against the grain to praise Communists, but if this would help to get Polish acquiescence it would, I think, be worth it and since as a Commission member responsible for (group corrupt) and supervising implementation of the agreement we have not charged the Vietminh with breaches, we already implicitly recognize their acceptable behaviour.

6. I would like to introduce a resolution along these lines, if you approve, within the next week or two. I would not press for an early vote, but would suggest that we should try to reach a decision early in April. This advance tabling of resolution would be in line with the course we have followed and which has gradually got results in regard to elimination of Commission teams.

7. Apart from the resolution there is the question of the Cambodian government's attitude. While not really essential, it would, I think, be very desirable that we should carry Prince Sihanouk with us in our desire to close. Moreover, persuading Sihanouk might prove an essential preliminary to persuading the Indians and Poles.

8. I would therefore like your authority to call on the Prince shortly for a frank discussion. I would remind him of our talk at the beginning of January (my telegram 7 January 10†) and tell him that now that South Vietnam has concluded its elections it seems logical to count on the stability of the régime in South Vietnam, and the [...][65] of the dissident Vietnamese sects, which have been a troubling element along the Cambodian-Vietnamese border, is well on its way to being broken, which removes the danger of Vietminh exploitation of this situation. I might take the opportunity during this interview of explaining to Sihanouk the inconveniences and the unwisdom of the Cambodian complaint to the Commission about border violations. Could explain the Communist desire to exploit this and exacerbate Cambodian-South Vietnam relations, and Sihanouk's face could be saved by using the fact that the complaints were made by the previous Cambodian government of Oun Chreang Sun. I would also point out to Sihanouk that in our view the Commission has no authority to (group corrupt) in relations between Cambodia and South Vietnam.

9. I am not unhopeful that I could persuade Sihanouk that it would be satisfactory for the Commission to leave within the next two or three months, as we had both envisaged earlier. Sihanouk will, I hope regard the threat implicit in the border troubles of the last two months as a temporary and now receding phase.

10. Moreover, it should not be hard to make Sihanouk conscious once again that the international "supervision and control" which are the Commission's functions are by now anachronistic. The Commission has within the past few days sent him a couple of letters (e.g. about amnesty of political prisoners) which, while (group corrupt) should serve to remind him that the Commission is potentially an outside critic of his internal affairs.

11. There is, of course, the risk that if Sihanouk is stimulated to expect an early Commission departure, and the Poles prove obdurate, the Cambodians might themselves take some initiative. As you know, my representations to Sihanouk last August and again at the beginning of January this year were designed to prevent this. However I think that the risk could be (group corrupt) if we ourselves continue to hold the initiative in consulting Sihanouk. I would hope that the most Cambodia would do would be a polite message to the Commission thanking them for their work to date, suggesting or requesting that their task now being accomplished, they leave. If such a note came after Canada had already introduced (her?) resolution to this effect in the Commission, it could I think only strengthen our hand and make the Polish position very difficult. In any case there is I think a good chance that any such Cambodian initiative would not prove necessary.

12. I would hope that the Indians could be brought to agree with us, at least as the result of the pressures of (a) our resolution, and (b) our talk with Sihanouk. Assuming we can convince Sihanouk, I do not think India would want to oppose him. I had a talk with Desai last November when he was passing through Phnom Penh, in which we then took the line that the Cambodian Commission must remain until there was a settlement in Vietnam. His views then struck me as silly and legalistic, and I did not report then because I hoped they would be modified after he got to Delhi. Judging from Escott Reid's telegram 54 January 19† to you, they were still rather rigid in mid-January. I would hope, however, that they might prove more flexible by now.

13. Though (group corrupt) we do not need to take any decision on this matter now, it is useful to consider what courses we might follow if the Poles oppose wind-up to the end. Introducing (group corrupt) course forcing to vote a formal resolution should have such obduracy more difficult for Poland than if we continue to leave the matter in the (group corrupt) of informal and off-the-record discussions. I suppose our ultimate sanction would be resignation. If the Cambodian and Indian governments decide with us that the Commission should go, this should not involve too much contumely. Nevertheless, I would hope that the present neutralist wave in Cambodian policy may make the Poles and Vietminh reluctant to set their face too firmly against what might be considered (group corrupt) in Cambodia's march toward (group corrupt) sovereignty and independence.

14. It is, of course, conceivable that at some (later date?) a declaration by Prince Sihanouk of continuing (group corrupt) to the obligations for Article 7 of the Cease-Fire Agreement would help to secure Polish consent to Commission wind-up, as suggested in your telegrams Y18 February 5, and Y21 February 10. If so, then when that time comes we could suggest to the Prince that he make an appropriate declaration. I doubt if in his present Bandung mood he would be hard to persuade, and I would recommend that we ask him only if it later proves necessary. As you know, for reasons set out in my telegram 45 February 24, I hope this may not prove necessary. If it does, perhaps I might at the same time take the opportunity of explaining to Sihanouk the real extent of this Article 7 obligations. It would seen a pity to lead the (group corrupt) in Cambodia unduly against our American friends.

15. If none of these measures win over the Poles we might, if we had to, take the line, and get the Indians to take it with us, that wind-up of the Commission was not a "reduction in activities" within the meaning of Article 25, and that therefore a majority decision would suffice. The Indians and the Poles here have taken the line that the elimination of Fixed Teams is not an "alteration in the location" of Fixed Team under Article 12 of the Cease-Fire Agreement. Acceptance of an analogous argument that wind-up is not a recognition of activities under Article 25 might, if the worst came to the worst, conceivably prove to the Indians more attractive than resignation. But there is I think a fair chance that we get eventual unanimity by persuasion. The Poles will not want to alienate either the Indians or the "neutralist" Cambodians and this gives us reasonable leverage.

16. We must of course consider the effect of winding up the Cambodian Commission on the situation in Vietnam and Laos is that it need have no ill effects at least providing we can by means of various pressures such as those outlined above induce the Poles to acquiesce, if not indeed to relax and enjoy it.

17. I suppose that with India's abandonment of her support for a reconvened Geneva Conference, the Communists must realize that the prospects of a conference now are very slight. This would help to make it possible, without danger, to take action in the Cambodian Commission without jeopardizing the situation in other part of Indochina.

18. Finally, I would point out that I see little or no risk, and therefore nothing to lose, in embarking on the course here suggested. We could always (take?) off the pressure at any given stage, and let matters rest for a while if the going got difficult. Meanwhile I do not see how any momentum built up could act other than in our favour.

19. I look forward to your comments and instructions.

FUTURE OF INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION IN CAMBODIA

We have reviewed the availability of the U.K. Ambassador in Cambodia discussing this subject with Prince Sihanouk in the light of comments contained in his telegram No. 103 of February 25 to the Foreign Office, your telegrams 45 and 46 and others relating to Cambodian-South-Vietnam frontier incidents and your telegram 55 of March 8 proposing a way home.

2. We have concluded that we would favour this approach being made fairly soon by U.K. Ambassador in order to:

(a) open up discussion of this subject with Sihanouk so that Cambodian government will act in knowledge of our objectives;

(b) dissuade Cambodians from expecting Commission to solve disputes with South Vietnam;

(c) enlist Cambodian support for Canadian initiatives to bring about withdrawal of Commission.

3. In the light of your comments we agree that it would be advisable to qualify brief outline of points contained in Foreign Office telegram No. 108 of February 20 to Phnom Penh to take account of following considerations:

(a) Indian Agreement to early withdrawal of the Commission is not assured. Our understanding was based on your report of Kirpal's views, which, as you point out, have not been fully accepted by Das or Delhi.

(b) It would be wise to qualify the suggestion that no new business should be brought to the Commission if Sihanouk should choose to discuss this point. However, we consider that the Commission is competent to intervene in frontier incidents only in unlikely event that intruding forces can be shown to be under Vietminh control. Lack of interference with recent elections suggests that security situation in South Vietnam is improving. We think that Cambodians would be unwise to provoke Vietminh by charging Vietminh intervention as in Voensai incident when charge cannot be clearly substantiated.[66] It would be better to deal with intruders by own security forces.

(c) Right timing of reiteration of unilateral declaration by Cambodian government would be important in order not to spend a bargaining counter too soon. In addition it would not be necessary for Cambodians to accept Polish or Indian interpretation of these obligations.

4. To take account of foregoing considerations we suggest that it will only be necessary to amend points in paragraph 2 of Foreign Office telegram to Phnom Penh No. 108 of February 20 in following respects, although further explanation may be given in discussion:

(a) Delete paragraph 2(1) and substitute the following:

[66] Référence à une violation présumée du territoire cambodgien par le Viêt-minh en août 1955. Voir United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmd. 9671, Fourth Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Cambodia, 1 April to 30 September, 1955, London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1956, pp. 18 à 20, et 56 à 61, et Cmnd. 253, Fifth Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Cambodia, 1 October, 1955, to 31 December, 1956, London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1957, pp. 38 à 42.

Refers to an alleged violation by the Viet Minh of Cambodian territory in August 1955. See United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmd. 9671, Fourth Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Cambodia, 1 April to 30 September, 1955, London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1956, pp. 18-20, and 56-61, and Cmnd. 253, Fifth Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Cambodia, 1 October, 1955, to 31 December, 1956, London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1957, pp. 38-42.

"We have been considering the future of the three international Commissions in the light of the progress made in each country toward fulfilment of the objectives of the Geneva settlement. It is evident that Cambodia has largely discharged its responsibilities ant the Commission could be safely withdrawn fairly soon".

(b) Insert following sentences at beginning of paragraph 2 (iii) "The Commission has now eliminated all but two teams outside Phnom Penh. The Canadians plan to propose the complete withdrawal of the Commission when they think the time opportune. They hope to have Indian support for this move."

(c) In paragraph 2(iv) substitute word "case" for words "Canadian and Indian arguments".

5. The foregoing paragraphs summarize our conclusions from the review which we have made of the advisability of an early approach to Prince Sihanouk. This is for your information only at this stage. We are passing a copy of this telegram to the United Kingdom authorities as a reply to their enquiry on the subject. It is the responsibility of the Foreign Office, of course, to determine what new instructions should be sent to the United Kingdom Ambassador in Phnom Penh. No doubt you will keep closely in touch with him on this matter.

6. We are sending in a separate telegram our comments on the helpful suggestions conveyed in your telegram No. 55 of March 8th discussing "a way home". We agree with you that it would be a good idea for you to introduce a resolution regarding the withdrawal of the Commission at an early date, but we are inclined to think that it would be desirable to have this approach discussed by Mr. Reid with the Ministry of External Affairs in Delhi, first. We doubt if it would really be wise to try to argue that wind-up of the Commission is not "reduction in activities" within the meaning of Article 25. We agree with you that at this stage the best course is for us to "play it straight". It may be that the Pole will insist upon exercising a veto and that this will result in a report to the Co-Chairmen. As you suggested, a considerable delay would probably be involved in securing agreement of all the Geneva powers to the elimination of the Commission from Cambodia. We are inclined to think, therefore, that at the appropriate stage it would probably be tactically most effective to have the Cambodian Government write to the Co-Chairmen requesting the withdrawal of the Commission. There might then be some diplomatic negotiations between United Kingdom, Soviet, and possible Cambodian Governments to seek a resolution of this matter. There is, of course, always the possibility of our resigning, but I think that recourse to this method should not be had until other procedures have been fully explored.

FUTURE OF INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION IN CAMBODIA

As indicated in paragraph 6 of our telegram under reference we think it would be preferable for Mr. Reid to discuss wind-up question with Ministry of External Affairs in Delhi before you introduce your resolution in Phnom Penh. This will preclude any chance of Indians saying we took them by surprise and will also give us an opportunity to try to win over Delhi to our way of thinking.

2. In our telegram under reference we agreed with the suggestion contained in your telegram No. 55 (which took a week to reach us) that best course is for us "to play it straight". In keeping with this we think that Mr. Reid might put forward the following arguments at this stage:

(a) The remaining tasks of Commission are few and of decreasing importance. The principal job left is supervision of ban of introduction of troops and armaments and establishment of bases (Article 7). A comparison of Cambodia's relatively small armed forces with much larger forces of South Vietnam and Thailand would indicate that there is very little danger of Cambodia instigating hostilities against its neighbours. (We think, however, that a mention now to the Indians of the possibility of a unilateral declaration by the Cambodian government might be premature.)

(b) Both DRVN and Cambodian governments appear to have discharged their main obligations under the Cease-Fire Agreement. It should facilitate work of remaining Commissions if other governments concerned see the withdrawal in Cambodia as an example that Commissions are ready to go when their jobs are done.

(c) The Cambodian government might be more readily induced to assume its full obligations as a sovereign nation and be less inclined to engage in petty bickering with its neighbours if it did not have Commission to appeal to. This should have salutary effect of stabilizing relations between countries in area.

(d) Withdrawal of Commission would remove the possible danger of Poles exploiting Cambodian/South Vietnamese tension in a manner which could only be beneficial to Communists.

We would be grateful for your comments on these arguments and for any suggestions which you might wish to add.

3. We think it might be useful for Mr. Reid to have with him when he calls on Indian Ministry of External Affairs a draft or outline of resolution which you propose to introduce. We would also like a chance to examine draft before its introduction. Concerning the proposed draft:

(a) We are inclined to favour the April 30 date as this would avoid tying up the withdrawal with the settlement of political problems in Vietnam as it is certain we can rule out the possibility of such a settlement taking place in July.

(b) We think preambulatory clauses suggested by you should be useful in persuading both Indians and Cambodians of desirability of winding up and would make it more difficult for the Poles and Russians to oppose our plans.

(c) We also agree that it would be helpful to recognize in resolution good behaviour of both parties.

4. It would be useful, in our opinion, to have your resolution introduced before Molotov and Lloyd meet in London in April when they will undoubtedly be discussing Indochina problems. It should be helpful to United Kingdom to have a definite plan in front of them at this time especially if we are successful in winning Indian and Cambodian support for it. It might even be possible for Lloyd to persuade Molotov to indicate Moscow's agreement to an early wind-up. (There is, of course, possibility that Russia may wish to get agreement for establishment of diplomatic mission in Phnom Penh in return for acquiescing in our withdrawal plans but this problem can only be tackled when it is met.)

5. New Delhi — Your comments on the advisability of course of action which we are considering will be welcome.

FUTURE OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION IN CAMBODIA

1. As requested in your telegram under reference I am submitting herewith a first draft of the resolution which, if you approve, I would introduce in the Commission. I agree with you that it would be useful to have this introduced before Molotov and Lloyd meet in London in April. Indeed, I would like to have it introduced soon enough that the interested Communist countries could have studied it in time for a possible decision during April.

2. I look forward to your suggestions for improvements in the draft. My approach would be to treat all the preambles as expendable, and I would propose that we be very flexible in dropping, amending, or even adding to them, providing no dangerous interpretation of Cambodia's obligations or actions is thereby given. If we end up from the negotiations with nothing left but paragraph 13, that will be all right with me, I have always found 13 a lucky number.

3. Text begins:

The International Commission for Supervision and Control in Cambodia,

1. Recalling that it was established by the terms of the Cease-Fire Agreement signed at Geneva on July 20, 1954 by representatives of the Royal Government of Cambodia and of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, for the purpose of supervising the execution by the parties of the provisions of the Agreement; and

2. Recognizing that the Royal Government of Cambodia has attained complete and effective sovereignty over the whole of its national territory, and has established conditions of political and social stability; and

3. Recognizing that with the Cambodian general election held on September 11, 1955 the political settlement foreseen in Article 6 of the Geneva Agreement, has been completed, and that the Royal Government of Cambodia is pursuing a broad policy of national reconciliation; and

4. Recognizing that foreign forces have long since been withdrawn, the prisoners of war have been released, and in general that both parties to the Agreement have faithfully honoured their obligations thereunder; and

5. Recognizing that the defence programme of the Royal Government of Cambodia is exclusively for the purpose of the effective defence of the territory, and that the defence forces and policies of Cambodia are not such as could constitute any threat to her neighbours; and

6. Confident that the Royal Government of Cambodia will continue not to join in any agreement with other states, if this agreement carries for Cambodia the obligation to enter into a military alliance not in conformity with the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, or, as long as its security is not threatened, the obligation to establish bases on Cambodian territory for the military forces of foreign powers; and that pending a settlement of political problems in Vietnam, the Royal Government of Cambodia will continue not to solicit foreign aid in war material, personnel or instructors except for the purpose of the effective defence of the territory;

7. Considering that Cambodia has recently become a member of the United Nations and has solemnly assumed all the obligations of the United Nations Charter;

8. Noting that the Commission decisions on the progressive reduction of its activities, as foreseen in Article 25 of the agreement on the cessation of hostilities, have been implemented without disturbing Cambodia's steady progress toward the consolidation of the peaceful and stable conditions, and that gradual elimination of the Commission's fixed and mobile teams formerly stationed through the country has been accomplished without any loss of confidence;

9. Considering that it is no longer either necessary or appropriate that an International Commission continue to exercise functions of supervision and control in the Sovereign State of Cambodia;

10. Congratulates the Royal Government of Cambodia and the Democratic Republic of Vietnam on their faithful observance of their mutual obligations under the agreement;

11. Thanks the two parties to the Agreement for their co-operation with the Commission;

12. Resolves to dissolve itself as of April 30, 1956, and to inform the members of the Geneva Conference accordingly. Text Ends.

CAMBODIA — FUTURE OF INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION

We are encouraged by reports of Heppel's talks with Khim Tit and Nong Kimny and yours with Kimny. Although there is still doubtful element of Sihanouk to consider we think time has now come for Mr. Reid to present our case in Delhi and tell Indians we propose to proceed with introduction of your wind-up resolution within next few days.

2. Legal Division have studied your resolution and are in general agreement with it from a procedural point of view. They see some legal difficulties which we will outline in a following telegram† but in view of existing circumstances and in the light of over-riding political considerations they think it could be argued that Commission has properly fulfilled its duties of supervision and control of Cease-Fire Agreement and that blame could not be apportioned to it for winding up operations.

3. In order to safeguard our position should we have to argue that dissolution of Commission is covered by Article 25 and is by analogy the last step in reduction of activities it may be necessary to agree to consultation with other Commissions. We would not suggest however that you raise this point in advance.

4. Phnom Penh: We expect to give you green light for introduction of resolution after we hear results of Mr. Reid's approach to Indian authorities.

5. New Delhi: Would you please take earliest opportunity to see Desai or other appropriate External Affairs officials outlining our plans as indicated above and using arguments contained in earlier telegrams on this subject. As we would like you to try to enlist Indian support for co-sponsorship, you may show them draft resolution. You may wish to indicate to Indian government general results of Smith's talk with Kimny without going into specific details. If Indians should bring up closing of Svay Rieng team as possible alternative to immediate wind-up of Commission you should indicate that, while we hope for early elimination of team, our firm and foremost objective is early withdrawal of Commission.

6. London: Please inform Foreign Office.

7. Vientiane and Hanoi: In view of Paragraph 3 above you may receive word from Phnom Penh Commission of its intention to dissolve itself. If such word is received we hope you will do all possible to ensure that your Commission does not object to wind-up action we are proposing.

CAMBODIA — DISSOLUTION OF THE COMMISSION

I saw Desai, the Commonwealth Secretary, on April 11 and gave him an informal memorandum on our reasons for believing that the Commission should be dissolved as soon as possible. These reasons are those set forth in paragraph 2 of your telegram Y221 of March 20. I also gave him the text of the draft resolution set forth in telegram 73 of March 27 from Arnold Smith, and expressed the hope that India might co-sponsor.

2. Desai said he could not give me a final reply until he had talked to Krishna Menon who is expected here in a couple of days. I emphasized that you had said to Menon that we had no intention of staying in Cambodia beyond this spring.[67] My impression is that Desai had not received an adequate report of your conversation with Menon and that he therefore could not commit himself until he had talked to Menon. Desai's own immediate reaction was as follows.

3. There is no hope of the Commission being dissolved in April. The earliest date at which dissolution could take place is the beginning of July. (He did not elaborate on his reasons for choosing this date. I explained we did not like July.) His information is that the Cambodian government is not prepared to request the withdrawal of the Commission until after it has learned of the results of the discussions in London between the two Co-Chairmen. Desai believes that the matter should be held over until those discussions have taken place.

4. His own personal opinion is that it would be better for the Canadian Commissioner in Cambodia not to give the impression of urgency about dissolution, an impression which, according to Desai, he has been giving since early January. This impression of urgency arouses the suspicions of the Pole. It is important not to confirm the Pole in his suspicion that Canada wants the Commission to get out of Cambodia in order to make Cambodia more susceptible to pressure from the United States exerted through South Vietnam and Thailand. (As you know, Mr. Nehru has publicly expressed sympathy with Sihanouk on his resignation).

5. At first Desai said that the procedure we suggested was the reverse of the right order, i.e. the first step, in his opinion, would be to secure the approval of the Co-Chairman for the dissolution of the Commission. I took him up on this and he later qualified his remarks to say that the Co-Chairman would have the right "to request" the Commission to continue in existence. (My own view which I did not give to Desai is that this whole question is academic. Our line is that the dissolution of the Commission requires the concurrence of India, Poland, Canada, North Vietnam and Cambodia. Is it likely that these five powers will agree on something that the U.K. and the Soviet Union would oppose? What difference is it, therefore, likely to make whether the Co-Chairmen are informed or asked to approve?)

6. Desai again mentioned a point which he has made on other occasions that our Commissioner in Cambodia should not feel that it is necessary for him to remain in Cambodia until the Commission is dissolved. Desai's view is that the tasks of the Commission are so slight our Commissioner could well withdraw leaving a very junior person in charge.

7. In my opinion our chances of carrying the Indians with us if Arnold Smith now presents our draft resolution would be poor. I suggest he should postpone it at least until Desai has had a chance to talk to Krishna Menon.

8. Since preparing the above report I have received your telegram Y275 of April 9† summarizing the Legal Division's memorandum on the draft wind up resolution. Desai this morning contended that dissolution would be the last step in reduction and therefore under Article 25 the Commission in Cambodia would be required, before dissolution, to consult with the Commissions in Vietnam and Laos and have regard to the developments of the situation in these two countries. Desai also mentioned the wording of Article 24 as illustrating the usual Indian point that the Geneva settlement must be considered as a whole and therefore that consideration of the question of the dissolution of the Cambodian Commission should be deferred until the results of the discussions between the Co-Chairmen on Vietnam and Laos are known.

CAMBODIA: DISSOLUTION OF COMMISSION

We have studied arguments put forward by Desai to Mr. Reid and are still convinced that immediate tabling of resolution is best course to pursue. You are therefore authorized to table your resolution at next Commission meeting.

2. Before tabling you should give statement outlining our reasons why we think Commission's work in Cambodia is done and why Commission should leave. As courtesy measure to both Poles and Indians, and in order to allay as much as possible Polish suspicions mentioned by Desai, you should take opportunity before Commission meets to inform both your colleagues of your intention and reasons behind it and perhaps give them advance copies of resolution. In view of these suspicions you should try to avoid giving impression of too much urgency when introducing resolution.

3. We do not think it is important to wait for results of Co-Chairmen's talks as United Kingdom have not indicated that they will raise Cambodia question with Gromyko. If question does come up it might not be disadvantageous for Co-Chairmen to learn that wind-up is under active consideration by Commission.

4. As return of Krishna Menon would not, in our opinion, be likely to alter Indian position we do not think postponement should be made for this reason. Our views were clearly given to him in New York so Indians could scarcely complain that we were acting without laying our hand on the table in advance.

5. For your information we understand that United States Embassy in New Delhi has recently given Indian External Affairs a paper designed to correct unfortunate impressions which Indians appear to hold concerning United States' actions and intentions in Cambodia. Paper tells Indians that United States is solely interested in assisting Cambodia to maintain its independence. We hope this will have some success in counteracting apparent Indian belief that United States is "putting pressure" on Cambodia to align itself with the West. From your reports we would gather that Indian Chargé in Phnom Penh can share blame with Sihanouk for Indian views on this score.

6. Although wind-up as early as end of April is probably not feasible there is no reason to change this date in resolution as long as we understand that date is flexible. We still prefer to avoid July date for reasons already given.

7. If Chairman is not prepared to write to Cambodian government requesting views we think you might approach Cambodian government again after suitable interval in attempt to persuade them to write to Commission advocating withdrawal. You may also wish to inform them in advance of your plans and give them gist of resolution or possibly text if you consider this advisable.

8. New Delhi: You may inform Desai of our intentions to proceed with tabling of resolution and express again our hope that Indians will support it. With reference to paragraph six of your telegram under reference you should say that question of Commissioner remaining in Phnom Penh has not entered into our considerations which are based entirely on our belief that Commission should not stay on after its work has been completed. For your information we agree that method of achieving dissolution in Cambodia is largely academic. Our reason for wishing Commission to take responsibility rather than Co-Chairmen is that we wish to avoid precedent which might be used in Laos or Vietnam at later date to impose decisions of Co-Chairmen on Commissions. In other words we wish to hold to our theory that we are principals and not agents.

9. London: Please inform Foreign Office of our plans.

10. Washington and Paris: Please inform State Department and Quai d'Orsay.

DISSOLUTION OF CAMBODIAN COMMISSION

Krishna Menon asked me to call on him this afternoon April 23. He had Desai with him.

2. Menon said that his position was still that which he had expressed to you in New York. He had told you that he did not believe that the Commission could now be dissolved. Instead he had proposed the maintenance of a "token" Commission. He himself could see no objection to Canada withdrawing all its personnel from Cambodia. It could be represented on the Cambodian Commission by one of its officers in Saigon who could come to Phnom Penh for the meetings of the Commission.

3. The important thing was to keep the Commission in Cambodia in existence so that it could be resurrected into activity if for example developments in Vietnam made this necessary.

4. They had received a report that Arnold Smith had proposed that a draft letter be sent to the Government of Cambodia enclosing the draft Canadian wind-up resolution and asking for Cambodia's views. He and Desai considered this as part of pressure tactics by our Commissioner. The Indian representative could not support such a letter since Cambodia might assume that the draft resolution had the approval of the Commission. If the Canadian Commissioner wanted to get the Cambodian government's views in writing he could write the Cambodian government himself.

4. Menon gave an example of the kind of situation which would require the resurrection of a Cambodian Commission which had lapsed into a state of suspended animation. The settlement in Vietnam might break down and there might be a movement of men and supplies from North Vietnam to South Vietnam by the valley of the Mekong to Krati.

5. Menon committed himself to the extreme statement that all three Commissions had to remain in existence — even if the existence were a token existence — until all were dissolved.

6. He also contended that no Commission could be dissolved without the consent not only of India, Poland and Canada but also of the signatories to the Armistice Agreement and the Co-Chairmen. I said that we agreed except insofar as he referred to the consent of the Co-Chairmen and I made an argument based on Article 25 of the Cambodian Agreement. He constantly referred to our proposal to dissolve the Cambodian Commission as constituting a "breach of" the Geneva Agreement. I of course insisted that we would not have proposed the resolution if we did not consider it consistent with the Geneva Agreements.

7. The only point on which I think I was able to budge him was that he at first insisted that the Cambodian Commission could not be dissolved without the "consent" of the other two Commissions. He finally agreed that it was not consent that was required but consultation.

8. He has been annoyed by what he calls the pressure the United States is putting on in Cambodia in support of our resolution.

9. Menon has now committed himself so firmly to the position that the Commission in Cambodia must remain in existence, at least on paper until the Commission in Laos and Vietnam have finished their work, that I do not see that there is any reasonable chance of his shifting his ground.

10. He is of course encouraged by the support which the French have given to the Indian position.

11. My own tentative recommendation on the basis of the information available to me here is that you should now take up the compromise proposal which Menon made to you in New York and which he reiterated to me today that the Commission's activities be so reduced that it becomes a "token" Commission and that we withdraw (our?) personnel from Cambodia and appoint one of our officers in Saigon as acting Commissioner on the Commission in Cambodia.

12. I am afraid that we are not going to get Indian support for ending the Commission with a bang. I suggest we be content to end it with a whimper.

TERMINATION OF COMMISSION IN CAMBODIA

We can legitimately be irritated with Krishna Menon for insisting that, even though the Cambodian Commission has nothing to do, it should remain in existence. It is particularly irritating for if it had not been for him the Indians might well have agreed to the dissolution of the Commission. This must be particularly galling to Arnold Smith with whom I sympathize greatly.

2. Desai asked me to call on him yesterday May 3. He said that they had received a report from their Commissioner in Cambodia about statements which Smith is alleged to have made to the Indian Chargé d'Affaires which have irritated them, especially Krishna Menon. The Indians claim that Smith asserted to the Indian Chargé that India had been responsible for putting Sihanouk up to making a statement at his press conference about wanting the Commission to continue in existence. The Chargé also reports that Smith said that if we did not get our way we would pull out of the Commission unilaterally. Desai said to me that he did not think this language was appropriate for use between "Commonwealth cousins". He also asked me outright, on instructions from Krishna Menon, whether Smith's threat was a statement of Canadian government policy.

3. I said that I had received no instructions from Ottawa since I had reported my conversation of April 23 with Krishna Menon. I reminded him of Mr. Pearson's determination not to have any Canadians left in Cambodia. Desai said this was quite different from threatening to leave the Commission since we could remain as members of the Commission even though our Commissioner resided in Saigon.

4. Desai also elaborated his own personal views on the curtailment of the Commission's activities in Cambodia. He said that India would have to keep some people in Cambodia since India was responsible for communications facilities for the Commission as long as it remained even technically in existence. It would also, he thought, be necessary to have two teams each composed of three people. It would not, however be necessary for all these six people to be physically present in Cambodia. Our members of the team might, for example live in Vietnam. He said the point was that since the reason for keeping the Commission in suspended animation was that it might be needed in an emergency, it would be necessary to have teams available for use in an emergency. He did not think it proper that the head of the Indian delegation in Cambodia should also head the Commission. Consequently India would keep a Chairman of the Commission in Cambodia though he might be a relatively junior officer.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

CAMBODIA: DISSOLUTION OF THE COMMISSION

You will recall that in your talk with the French Ambassador in Ottawa on April 26, just before your departure for Europe, you said that, as an interim measure to avoid the possibility of complicating the problems facing the Vietnam Commission, we might be willing to participate in a token Commission in Phnom Penh. You suggested that one of the other Commissioners in Indochina might serve also as Commissioner for Cambodia, with an officer of more junior rank remaining in Phnom Penh.

2. Since April 26 there have been several new developments concerning the Cambodian dissolution question which will make it necessary to send further instructions to Arnold Smith and also to our missions in New Delhi and Paris. Before deciding on what form the new instructions should take we thought the following outline of where we, and the other interested countries now stand on the dissolution question might be helpful:

(a) Canadian position: Our resolution calling for complete dissolution has been introduced in the Cambodian Commission accompanied by a firm statement that we consider the Cambodians have discharged their responsibilities under the Cease-Fire Agreement. The resolution calls for dissolution on May 15th but Smith has indicated that this date is flexible and he has not been pushing for early passage pending further instructions from us.

(b) Cambodian Position: Encouraged by Khim Tit and Nong Kimny, the Cambodian Prime Minister and Foreign Minister, who indicated agreement in principle with our dissolution plan, Smith recently called on Prince Sihanouk who said he would probably also go along with it. The next day, however, Sihanouk, after a subsequent visit from Mitra, the Indian Chargé d'Affaires in Cambodia, issued a statement to the press that he wanted the Commission to remain to be "a witness in case of eventual aggression". Sihanouk also said that "enquiry on the spot by mobile teams of the International Commission can establish facts better than enquiry afterwards by the United Nations. Poor little friendless Cambodia might be branded an aggressor and made a victim of sanctions. It would not be sportsmanlike for the Commission (to withdraw) at this juncture". This is a clear indication that Sihanouk, who lately has been obsessed with the idea that the United States and Cambodia's neighbours are trying to put pressure on Cambodia to abandon its "neutrality", wishes to use the Commission for purposes which lie entirely outside its terms of reference. Probably to give some backing to his statement, the Commission received, on the same day, a complaint from the Cambodian government that South Vietnamese troops had invaded Cambodia. Smith was able to stall the Commission from taking action on the complaint but it is not certain we will always be successful in this and if Sihanouk has his way and unless the Indians change their attitude, the Commission may well become involved in Cambodia's disputes with South Vietnam and possibly even Thailand. There is, of course, the possibility that Sihanouk may be using the wind-up question as another excuse for indulging in a display of self-pity, but in any event the reasons he gives in support of the Commission remaining give additional emphasis to our reasons for wishing to get out as soon as possible.[68]

(c) Indian Position: Until Krishna Menon recently returned to New Delhi we had every reason to believe that the Indians would support our resolution for an early dissolution. Both Parthasarathi and Desai had agreed that our reasons were convincing and it is apparently only Menon's arbitrary view that all three Commissions must remain in being so long as any one does that is holding the Indians back. While Menon's view has no legal justification it may well be based on his anxiety to keep Cambodia in the "neutral" camp. There is also the possibility that Indian views may be coloured by the distorted reports they are receiving from Phnom Penh, presumably from Mitra, concerning Smith's so-called "pressure" tactics. From the reports we are receiving from Phnom Penh it is apparent that the Indians regard Cambodia as in their special sphere of influence and are doing all they can to lessen United States influence in the country. This attitude on the part of the Indians, combined with Sihanouk's increasingly difficult and unpredictable behaviour, makes it more than ever necessary for us to ensure that we are not placed in a position where we might find ourselves inadvertently committed by actions taken or statements made in the name of the Commission to policies which would be in the Indian interests but could be quite contrary to United States and Western interests. Some Indians, including Mitra, the present Indian Chargé d'Affaires in Phnom Penh, try to persuade the Cambodians that Article 7 of the Cease-Fire Agreement should be interpreted as precluding Cambodia from accepting military aid from the United States. They also say that the United States Military Advisory Group should be withdrawn before Cambodia can rightfully take her place in the "neutral" bloc. We had an illustration of this Indian thinking during the Commission's MAAG discussions last year and it is apparent that the Indians have met with some success among Cambodians, and especially Sihanouk, in promoting this line.

(d) Polish Position: The Polish Commissioner in Phnom Penh recently told Smith that Poland will open a Legation in Cambodia within the next two or three months. The Poles have told us, as well as the Australians and British, that they have no real objection to an early dissolution of the Commission. This attitude is probably accounted for by the prospects of opening a diplomatic mission. It is unlikely, however, that the Poles would vote against the Indians if the latter remain stubborn.

(e) United Kingdom and United States Views: The United Kingdom and the United States both agree with us that an early withdrawal is desirable; the United Kingdom has said so to the Cambodian government, but contrary to Krishna Menon's allegations, the United States had not made its views known to the Cambodians. The Foreign Office has expressed the hope to us that whatever alternative arrangement we might make will not leave the field in Cambodia entirely to the Poles and Indians.

(f) French Position: Now that Lord Reading and Gromyko have agreed on the texts of messages to the French, the two governments in Vietnam and the International Commission there is a reasonable chance that at least a temporary basis for the Vietnam Commission to carry on has been found.[69] The messages do not dispose of all the problems raised by the Vietnam Commission in its communications to the Co-Chairmen, but the Co-Chairmen's request to the French government for assistance could provide a means for enabling the Commission to carry on providing, of course, that the Indians do not raise further legal difficulties. The French do not disagree with our general position that the Commission in Cambodia should cease to exist; but were worried about our timing of the dissolution. Now that there is a good chance that the Vietnam Commission will continue its work the French will become reconciled to the idea of an early dissolution in Cambodia.

3. In view of the situation outlined above, and the additional points made in the attached telegrams which have been prepared for your signature if you concur, we could, if you considered it necessary or desirable, take a very firm line in the Cambodian Commission for immediate dissolution on legal, moral and practical ground and could even develop a strong case for our unilateral withdrawal. Because of the somewhat strained atmosphere which has developed between ourselves and the Indians over the Cambodian issue; because of French worries and also because of the degree of uncertainty surrounding the futures of the Vietnamese and Laotian Commissions we think it would be preferable, however, to try the less drastic course suggested in the attached two telegrams. This would mean that:

(a) We would have to plan to maintain our Delegation in Cambodia at pretty well the same strength as it is now for a further period (2 External and 6 Army officers). The Indians have told Escott Reid that they think two teams with three men on each should remain and this, with headquarters staff, would make further personnel reductions difficult.[70]

(b) Our resolution would not be withdrawn and Smith would say in the Commission that our opinion has not changed but that, because we seem unable to reach agreement with the other delegations at this stage, we are not pressing for its immediate adoption but would hope that his colleagues would continue to give consideration to our views and that we may resurrect our resolution in the light of events during the next two or three months.

(c) We would have to find an experienced officer of about FSO-4 or 5 rank perhaps drawn from our Vietnam Delegation to serve as Acting Commissioner when Smith leaves. It would be difficult for Williams, who will only have the rank of Acting Commissioner himself, or Bridle to devote any attention to Cambodia as the complicated and delicate problems facing the Commissions in both Vietnam and Laos keep them very fully occupied. The Indians have said they do not think it would be proper for them to have the head of the Indian legation in Phnom Penh serve also as head of the Commission. Consequently they would keep a chairman of the Commission in Cambodia although he might be a relatively junior officer. Such an arrangement would most probably still leave the head of the Indian legation responsible in fact, if not in name, for the Commission. If he should be a trouble-maker like the present incumbent, Mitra, we would be taking risks if our representative was weak or lacked experience.

(d) Our approach to the Indians in New Delhi would be on a friendly informal basis designed to smooth ruffled feathers but at the same time making our position on the wind-up question clear and correcting erroneous impressions concerning Smith's operations in Phnom Penh.[71]

(e) Our approach to the French could also be on an informal basis as outlined in the attached telegrams.

Surely we don't have to go along with two teams and 2 External officers [L.B. Pearson]

[71] Note marginale :/Marginal Note:

4. One possible way of solving the Commissioner question, mentioned in 3 (c) above, would be the opening of a Canadian legation in Cambodia with perhaps the Ambassador in Djakarta as Minister and a resident Chargé d'Affaires in Phnom Penh.[72] Smith has received several informal feelers from the Cambodian government about a diplomatic exchange between Cambodia and Canada but has so far managed to evade the issue. In view of the higher priorities for opening in other South East Asia countries, such as Burma and Malaya, we would have to examine very carefully the various implications before any decision was taken to open in Phnom Penh. It is probably time, however, that we contemplated having some sort of diplomatic representation to the various Indochina Governments after our Commissions are withdrawn because:

(a) There is a political job to be done by good Western diplomats if this area, and especially Cambodia, is to be successfully kept out of the Communist bloc;

(b) In an area where Western representation is thin Canada would be in a position to capitalize on the influence and good will built up by our participation in the Supervisory Commissions;

(c) With representation we might be able to retain the weight which should be attached to Canadian views on this potentially critical area, in case they ever need to be expressed in Washington or London, on issues affecting international peace;

(d) Diplomatic missions would give us a needed diplomatic channel for Colombo Plan activities if these are to be continued.

CAMBODIA — DISSOLUTION OF COMMISSION

Because of Indian and French opposition to our plan for early dissolution of the Cambodian Commission and because of Sihanouk's recent statements to the press that he would like the Commission to remain (for reasons we cannot accept) we have been having a close look at where we go from here. There would seem to be two paths left open to us:

(a) To take a very firm line in the Commission for immediate dissolution. This course could be well defended on legal and moral grounds and we could even develop a strong case for our unilateral withdrawal. It is most unlikely, however, given the present mood of the Indians, French and Sihanouk, that we would emerge from such a course of action without seriously upsetting the Indians, and to a lesser degree the French. To achieve our ends we would probably have to eventually resort to the extreme step of unilateral withdrawal and this would certainly do considerable damage to Canadian-Indian relations. It might also provide a precedent for similar action by the Indians or Poles in Laos or Vietnam which could be unfortunate. Another result which would not be helpful to Western interests might be that the field in Cambodia would be left open to the Poles and Indians.

[72] Note marginale :/Marginal Note:
I don't like this very much! L.B. P[earson]

(b) The second path we might follow would be to accept the necessity of keeping the Commission going for a further interim period during which we could concentrate on smoothing the Indians' ruffled feathers and trying to convince them, and the French and Cambodians, that our withdrawal plan is fair and logical and should be adopted as early as possible. Our chances of success in this are not easily predicted but rather than risk the consequences which would undoubtedly arise from pursuit of the policy outlined in (a) above I think we should adopt this less drastic course. If it proves unrewarding we may then have to examine again, after a reasonable interval of time, our other alternative.

2. Phnom Penh: We will now have to plan to maintain our Commission in Cambodia at pretty well the same strength as it is now for a further period. The Indian view that two teams with three men on each should remain means, if we add headquarters staff, that further personnel reductions will be difficult. You should take an early opportunity to make a statement in the Commission along the following lines:

(a) Our views remain unchanged and we are leaving our resolution on the table.

(b) Because we seem unable to get the agreement of the other delegations at this stage, we will not press for its immediate adoption.

(c) It is our hope, however, that your colleagues will continue to give careful consideration to our views and that they may soon be convinced of their reasonableness.

(d) We may, in the light of events during the next two or three months, resurrect our resolution and call for a decision.

(e) We will not, at this time, press for a decision on the sending of a letter to the Cambodian Government seeking its views on dissolution. As in the case of the resolution we reserve the right to resurrect the question and call for a decision at any time we think events have reached the point when such a decision must be reached.

3. New Delhi: If you see no serious objection, would you please arrange another interview with Desai or Menon (we will leave the choice to you) and present our views along the lines contained in our immediately following telegram. I think it would be helpful also to leave an aide-mémoire outlining our views. Although you will be able to judge best how firm you should be I think an informal approach somewhat on the "old boy" basis would be preferable. You might say that we regret that some misunderstandings seem to have arisen in Phnom Penh and that we hope this situation, which is after all not too serious, won't serve to cloud the more serious issues involved. We do not know how or why certain reports concerning Smith's alleged "pressure tactics" have reached New Delhi but we wouldn't like to think they would disturb our valued friendship with India. We note from your telegram 315 of May 9† that you have already taken an opportunity to straighten out the record concerning the allegations about Smith. When you call again you might also say that at no time have we asked the United States to speak in support of our resolution and that in fact the State Department have told us that they have not done so nor do they have any intention of doing so unless the Cambodian government seeks their views. (The State Department and Foreign Office have both indicated agreement with our withdrawal plan but it was only the British Ambassador who, at our request spoke to the Cambodian government to this effect).

4. Smith's telegrams will provide you with information on any additional points which you think might usefully be made. For instance you might also say that we were surprised at a recent Agence France Presse report that "according to Indian sources the Cambodian Commission is to be dissolved on April 28"; especially as we understand that Mitra told Smith he had originated this report but had actually referred to the Vietnam Commission and had been misunderstood. We find it a trifle difficult to understand just why Mitra should make a statement of this nature to the press concerning any of the Commissions.

5. Paris Embassy: If you see no serious objections would you please take an early opportunity to call at the Quai d'Orsay giving our views as outlined in our immediately following telegram and leaving an aide-mémoire. You should say that we fully understand, although we cannot fully appreciate, French fears concerning dissolution of the Cambodian Commission and that, as I recently told the French Ambassador in Ottawa, we do not intend to make any precipitate moves which might adversely affect the future of the other two Commissions. Although our resolution will not be withdrawn we will not press for its early passage and will be continuing our representation on the Cambodian Commission for an indefinite period. We hope the French will keep our arguments under review and, now that Lord Reading and Gromyko have agreed on the texts of messages to the French, to the two governments in Vietnam and to the International Commission, which promises a reasonable chance that at least a temporary basis has been found on which the Vietnam Commission can continue to operate, the Quai d'Orsay may be more inclined to accept dissolution if, within the next two or three months, we find it opportune to resurrect the resolution. You may assure the French that we will keep them fully informed of any future moves we may make concerning the withdrawal question and we will always welcome and give consideration to their views.

6. London and Washington: Please pass this and my immediately following telegram to the CRO, Foreign Office and State Department.

CAMBODIA — DISSOLUTION OF COMMISSION

We do not wish to let our different points of view on the question of dissolution of the Cambodian Commission degenerate into a quarrel between us and the Indians which could only be harmful to our mutual friendly relations. We are convinced that our basic objectives are the same:

(a) to act in the best interests of the preservation of peace in South East Asia and

(b) at the same time act in the best interest of Cambodia.

2. We think, therefore, that you should, in accordance with my immediately preceding telegram, present our views to the Indians and French along the following lines:

(a) We cannot subscribe to the Indian theory that our proposal constitutes "a breach of" the Geneva Agreements. (It might even be noted that it would be difficult for us to "breach" an agreement we have not signed.) We have not taken decision to seek a dissolution of the Cambodian Commission lightly or without a thorough study of all the implications, both legal and practical, as we see them. In introducing our "wind-up" resolution we were prompted by our desire to act in what we consider the best interest of Cambodia with whom we have developed, through our participation on the Commission, friendly and we hope lasting ties.

(b) Before preparing our resolution we had every reason to believe that the Indian representatives in Indochina were in substantial agreement with our view that an early dissolution was desirable. Parthasarathi, in his conversations with Smith, has consistently taken the line that the Cambodian Commission would wind-up separately and that anything else would be most unfair to Cambodia. Parthasarathi gave this assurance as early as August 1955 and has reasserted it as recently as April 19 in a letter to Smith in which he said "I think we are in general agreement" and that "we should consider the question about the 15th of May". He had previously promised a decision in early May. Major General Kirpal, when Indian Commissioner in Cambodia, put in writing to Smith and the Polish Commissioner on January 7 that the Cambodian Commission should be wound up at the latest by July 1st, if indeed an earlier wind-up did not appear feasible, and that the actual timing was to be considered in April. Both the Polish Commissioner and Smith replied in writing as accepting the principles of early discussion of dissolution, irrespective of maintenance of other two Commissions. The new Indian approach to the question, therefore, understandably came as a surprise to us in view of our earlier understanding that they were prepared to go along with the withdrawal plan. If either side, therefore, has any cause for complaint it is ours.

(c) Our effort during our term on the Cambodian Commission have consistently been joined with the Indian and Polish delegations towards establishment of a free and stable Cambodian Kingdom ready to assume its place in the family of nations in keeping with the future envisaged for it at the Geneva Conference. The Commission officially recognized in the Fourth Interim Report that Cambodia has fulfilled its main obligations (including those in Article 6) under the Geneva Agreement and we find it hard to interpret a suggestion that the Kingdom's future be tied to that of Vietnam and Laos, where unfortunately the implementation of the Geneva Agreement has not met with the same success, as being in Cambodia's best interests. Indeed we think it would be quite unfair to penalize Cambodia because the two parties to the Vietnam Agreement have not yet been able to agree on its implementation.

(d) The continued presence of a Commission composed entirely of foreigners, no matter how well disposed they might be towards the Cambodians, in itself implies a limitation on Cambodia's sovereignty; especially when the major tasks for which the Commission was formed have been completed. We are opposed to the Commission taking on new tasks beyond those assigned to it under the Cease-Fire Agreement; nor do we think that it is healthy for Cambodia, as a sovereign nation, to rely on a Commission, set up for an entirely different purpose, to regulate its affairs with its neighbours. Sihanouk's recent press statements indicate that Cambodia's desire to have the Commission remain springs from a hope that the Commission will involve itself in matters which lie entirely outside its terms of reference. We do not intend to support this position or investigations by the Commission into complaints of alleged incidents which are clearly outside its jurisdiction. We hope that Sihanouk will soon be persuaded to see merit in our withdrawal plan. Both Khim Tit and Nong Kimny have indicated agreement in principle with it.

(e) We share the Indian concern about a possible breakdown of the Vietnam settlement but think that our combined efforts to reach some satisfactory solution of the problem there are meeting with some success and that the grave situation envisaged by Menon will not come about. We are doubtful, however, if insisting on relating Cambodia's future as a nation with that of Vietnam would be helpful to the former should such a sorry state of events come to pass. It would seem to us that Cambodia would stand a much better chance of avoiding involvement in any possible Vietnamese internal disputes if it had been clearly recognized that its obligations under the Geneva settlement had been fulfilled and its concern with Vietnamese problems were only those which any independent nation might have towards the affairs of a neighbouring state. We should not like to think that either party in Vietnam would take so grave a step as invading one of its neighbours; but we cannot think that a Commission in Cambodia would be effective in stopping such an invasion should it unhappily occur. The only way Vietminh troops could enter Cambodia would be via South Vietnam or Laos where it is assumed that the International Commissions in those countries would take whatever action they considered appropriate. If Cambodia should be invaded or has reason to fear external threats it is open to it to appeal to the United Nations. If the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, which after all signed the Agreement with Cambodia, is willing to agree that Cambodia has fulfilled its obligations under the Agreement this should help ensure against the possible situation Menon envisages.

(f) It is our understanding that at Geneva the Cambodian representatives insisted on separate agreements for the three Indochina countries. Their insistence on signing their own Agreement, which was agreed to by the Conference, also indicated that Cambodia wished to pursue its course independent of Vietnam and Laos. We realize that as long as the French were in a position of some authority there was naturally an interrelationship between the problems of the three but now that the position has changed and Cambodia and Laos have entered the United Nations as independent Kingdoms there can be little excuse for insisting on continuing this interrelationship, to the detriment of Cambodia. The Geneva Agreements themselves do not provide for more than "consultations" between the three Commissions and we do not think it either unreasonable or inconsistent that one of the Commissions should decide to dissolve itself, in consultation with the others, if its work is done. Neither do we think that this should affect the continuing work of the other Commissions.

(g) Now that Lord Reading and Mr. Gromyko have agreed on the text of messages to the French, the two governments in Vietnam and the International Commission there appears to be a good chance that at least a temporary basis for the Vietnam Commission to carry on has been found. It would therefore seem to us that dissolution of the Cambodian Commission at this time would be opportune as the chances of it upsetting the Vietnam situation would be most remote.

3. For reasons outlined above and in earlier telegrams we tabled, in good faith, our resolution for an early dissolution of the Cambodian Commission and we therefore thought it only reasonable that the Cambodian Government should be asked by the Commission for its views. We did not think there should be any misunderstanding by the Cambodians concerning the status of a resolution which was still under consideration by the Commission. When these had been obtained it would, of course, have been proper to ask the DRVN, as the other signatory of the Cease-Fire Agreement, for its views. As it is apparent, however, that at this time we cannot get agreement for our dissolution plan in the Commission we have instructed our Commissioner in Phnom Penh to make a statement in the Commission explaining our position. (Paragraph 2 of our immediately preceding telegram)

4. As I indicated to Menon in New York we hoped to be able to withdraw all Canadian personnel from Cambodia this spring. Because the Indians and Poles will be continuing to have personnel serving on the Commission in Phnom Penh and because the pressure of their work and responsibility would make it difficult for either of our other Commissioners to devote adequate attention to Cambodia at this time, we have decided to continue to staff our Delegation in Phnom Penh although probably at reduced strength, for a short time.

5. Points (f) and (g) in paragraph 2 above which would appeal more to India would have to be modified in the aide-mémoire left with the French.

6. We will be interested in having your impressions on how the Indians and French, and in the case of Phnom Penh the Poles, react to our revised approach.

CAMBODIA — DISSOLUTION OF COMMISSION

I saw Desai on the afternoon of May 21 and spoke to him along the lines of the most helpful paragraphs 3 and 4 of your telegram Y389 of May 14. I think this helped to smooth ruffled feathers. His only direct comment was on my statement that the State Department had told us that the United States does not intend to speak in support of our resolution unless the Cambodian Government seeks its views. He said he thought the USA Ambassador in Cambodia might well have acted without instructions from the State Department.

2. He politely refused to be drawn on the informal memorandum which McGaughey had left with Jha on your telegram Y390 of May 14. All he said was that the part he had found of greatest interest was that summarizing the instructions to our commissioner in Phnom Penh on the statement he should make.

3. My impression is that Desai's view is that now we have given the Indians an informal memorandum which sets forth the background of our resolution (with?) the arguments for it clearly and in detail, no useful purpose would be served by going into the differences which have arisen in Phnom Penh.

4. I [may] find Krishna Menon in a more argumentative mood when I next see him but unless he raises the question I shall be content to let sleeping dogs lie.

TALKS WITH MR. NEHRU: DISSOLUTION OF THE CAMBODIAN COMMISSION

In my memorandum of December 4† I suggested, and you agreed, that instead of taking up the question of the future of the Cambodian Commission with Mr. Krishna Menon in New York, you would discuss the matter with Mr. Nehru during his visit to Ottawa.[73] You also agreed that, because the field to be covered in the talks with Mr. Nehru is rather wide, you would leave with him an aide mémoire, which would review in more detail than might be possible during the talks, our earlier arguments in favour of dissolution and give our reasons for reopening the question at this time. Because we are not planning to leave any other papers with Mr. Nehru during his visit here I am inclined to think that, in place of the aide mémoire it might be more appropriate to substitute a memorandum which I could hand to Mr. Pillai instead of you giving it to Mr. Nehru. Attached for your information is a copy of the memorandum which I propose, subject to your agreement, to give to Mr. Pillai.

2. The memorandum outlines in some detail our reasons, both new and old, for wishing to wind up the Cambodian Commission as soon as possible. When you are talking to Mr. Nehru you might wish to mention that I will be leaving this paper with Mr. Pillai and that we will be asking our High Commissioner in New Delhi to give a copy to the Indian External Affairs Department and our Acting Commissioner in Phnom Penh to give a copy to his Indian colleague. During the conversation you might wish to stress the following points which are contained in the memorandum:

(a) We continue to think that the reasons which prompted us to call for dissolution of the Commission last May are valid.

(b) The Commission has had no major tasks and very few minor ones, none of which have been important enough to warrant its continued existence, since last May.

(c) There has been general recognition, not only by the Commission in its Fourth Interim Report in October, 1955, but on many other occasions by the Cambodian Government and other leaders of countries directly interested in the Cambodian settlement, that the Cambodian Government has completely fulfilled the terms of the Cease-Fire Agreement.

(d) There has been a general easing of tensions between Cambodia and its neighbouring states which, although not of direct concern to the Commission provides less excuse for the Cambodian Government wishing the Commission to remain.

(e) We think it important, especially at this time, to provide an illustration that international operations of this kind, in which both Canada and India have participated and in which we might be called upon to take part again, can be officially concluded when the task involved has been completed. There is some justifiable feeling on the part of Canadians that once we get into a temporary international body of this kind it tends to become more and more permanent. We think it would be useful, therefore, to be able to point to an

International Commission which has successfully accomplished the work assigned to it and has then been dissolved without attempting to perpetuate itself.

3. During a recent discussion with Mr. Reid in New Delhi concerning the three Indochina Commissions, Mr. Desai, who is head of their Commonwealth Division, said that he thought the Commissions in both Cambodia and Laos should remain in being until the Commission in Vietnam is dissolved. We feel quite strongly, and I am sure you will agree, that the futures of the three Commissions should not now be interrelated. The agreements themselves do not call for more than consultations between the three Commissions and we think it reasonable and consistent that one of the Commissions should decide to dissolve itself in consultation with the others when its work is done.

4. You might also like to inform Mr. Nehru that for these reasons we think the time has now come to resurrect our dissolution resolution which we introduced in the Commission last May and we plan to instruct our Acting Commissioner in Phnom Penh to call for a vote on it early in the New Year. When he takes this action we would like him to have the agreement and support of his Indian and Polish colleagues. (We have reason to believe that the Poles will not oppose withdrawal of the Commission if the Indians agree to it.) We would be grateful, therefore, if the Indian Government would give very careful consideration to the arguments outlined in the Memorandum which we are leaving with Mr. Pillai and would be kind enough to indicate to us as soon as possible what attitude it will take when we call for the vote.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Extrait d'une note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Extract from Memorandum by Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, December 20, 1956

More than six months have gone by since the Canadian Commissioner on the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Cambodia tabled a resolution at a Commission meeting in Phnom Penh calling for dissolution of the Commission on the grounds that the Geneva Cease-Fire Agreement for Cambodia had been satisfactorily implemented and the work of the Commission was therefore completed. Although we considered, and still consider, that we had a strong moral and legal case to back our resolution we decided not to press for its adoption at that time because of the opposition of the Indian and Cambodian Governments.

[Voici deux paragraphes basés sur le document 707, les paragraphes 2(b) et 2(c).
Here follow two paragraphs based on Document 707, paragraphes 2(b) and 2(c).]

Now that the Geneva Cease-Fire Agreement has been implemented, the continued presence of a commission, which was set up specifically to supervise the implementation, in our opinion implies a limitation on Cambodia's sovereignty which is not in keeping with its position as an independent state that has fulfilled its obligations under the Agreement. At the time when we introduced our resolution it was evident from Prince Sihanouk's press statements that Cambodia's desire to have the Commission remain sprang from a hope that the Commission would involve itself in matters which lay entirely outside its terms of reference. These matters largely involved Cambodia's relations with its neighbouring states, principally South Vietnam. We were opposed and continue to be opposed to the Commission taking on new tasks beyond those assigned to it under the Cease-Fire Agreement nor do we think it is healthy for Cambodia as a sovereign nation to rely on a Commission, set up for an entirely different purpose, to regulate its affairs with its neighbours. We have therefore never given support to any suggestions or actions which might involve the Commission in tasks which are beyond its terms of reference and we have resisted any suggestions that the Commission should take part in investigations into complaints or alleged incidents which are clearly outside its jurisdiction. Fortunately the boundary and other disputes between Cambodia and South Vietnam have subsided and there appears to be a disposition in both countries to settle the differences between them by peaceful and reasonable bilateral negotiations. Cambodia's reasons for wishing to see the Commission remain have therefore largely disappeared.

In September of this year Prince Sihanouk said publicly that, while he would like the Commission to remain, he would not raise objections if it decided to leave. A short time later, in an interview with our Acting Commissioner in Phnom Penh, Prince Sihanouk said that whilst Cambodia was "happy to have the Commission here, there would be no objection if they wish to leave". These two remarks by him would seem to us to indicate a definite switch from his earlier position and a willingness to place the onus for withdrawal on the Commission itself.

We understood, at the time our resolution was tabled, that the Indian Government's principal reason for wishing the Cambodian Commission to continue was because of its concern about a possible breakdown of the Vietnam Settlement. This breakdown has not taken place and we continue to be hopeful that our combined efforts to reach some satisfactory solution of the problems in Vietnam may meet with some success and that the situation there, while admittedly difficult, is not such that it immediately threatens the peace in the area. In any event, we are doubtful whether insisting on relating Cambodia's future as a nation with that of Vietnam would be helpful to the former. It would seem to us that Cambodia would stand a much better chance of avoiding involvement in any possible Vietnamese internal disputes if the Commission had withdrawn in clear recognition that Cambodian obligations under the Geneva Settlement had been fulfilled and its concern with Vietnamese problems were only those which any independent nation might have towards the affairs of a neighbouring state. We should like to think that neither party in Vietnam would take so grave a step as invading one of its neighbours; but we cannot think that a Commission in Cambodia would be effective in stopping such an invasion if it unhappily took place. If Cambodia should be invaded, from either North or South Vietnam or has reason to fear external threats from its neighbours it is able to appeal to the United Nations.

It is our understanding that at Geneva the Cambodian representatives insisted on separate agreements for the three Indochina countries. Their insistence on signing their own agreement, which was accepted by the Conference, also indicated that Cambodia wished to pursue its course independent of Vietnam and Laos. We realize that as long as the French were in the position of authority, there was naturally an inter-relationship between the problems of the three but now that the position has changed and Cambodia and Laos have taken their place in the family of the United Nations as independent States, there can be little excuse for insisting on continuing this inter-relationship to the detriment of Cambodia. The Geneva Agreements themselves do not provide for more than "consultations" between the three Commissions and we think it reasonable and consistent that one of the Commissions should decide to dissolve itself in consultation with the others when its work is done. We do not think that this should have any effect on the continuing work of the other Commissions.

For the reasons outlined above, we tabled in good faith our resolution for an early dissolution of the Cambodian Commission. At the same time we thought it only reasonable that the Cambodian Government should be asked by the Commission for its views. If these had been obtained we would have considered it proper to ask the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, as the other signatory of the Cease-Fire Agreement, for its views. When it became apparent, however, that we could not get Indian agreement for our dissolution plan in the commission, we instructed our Commissioner in Phnom Penh to make a statement in the Commission explaining our position along the following lines:

(a) Our views remained unchanged and we were leaving our resolution on the table.

(b) Because we seemed unable to get the agreement of the other delegations at that stage, we would not press for its immediate adoption.

(c) It would be our hope, however, that the other delegations would continue to give careful consideration to our views and that they would soon be convinced of their reasonableness.

(d) We might, in the light of events during the following months, resurrect our resolution and call for a decision.

(e) We would not at that time (in May) press for a decision on the sending of a letter to the Cambodian Government seeking its views on dissolution. As in the case of the resolution, however, we reserved the right to resurrect this question and call for a decision at any time we thought events had reached the point when such decision might be reached.

We have been giving continuous thought to this question of dissolving the Cambodian Commission and have now decided that it is time to raise it again because:

(a) It has become quite clear that the Commission in Phnom Penh has had no major tasks and very few minor ones during the last six months and none of these of enough importance to warrant its continued existence.

(b) It has been generally recognized that the Cambodian Government has completely fulfilled the terms of the Cease-Fire Agreement. The Cambodian Government itself recognized this in a letter to the Commission in August which read in part: "All the obligations imposed by the Geneva Agreements having been fulfilled by Cambodia, it is to be presumed that the International Commission will put an end to its Mission there shortly".

(c) Prince Sihanouk, during his visits to several countries earlier in the year mentioned on several occasions that he considered that Cambodia had fulfilled its obligations under the Cease-Fire Agreement. For instance, the third last paragraph of the text of the communiqué issued by Mr. Bulganin and Prince Sihanouk during the latter's recent visit to Moscow stipulates that the execution by Cambodia of the provisions of the Cease-Fire Agreement had been noted.

(d) The attitude of the North Vietnam press and radio would lead us to believe that there would not be opposition to withdrawal of the Commission from this source. The Government of the DRVN appears to recognize that Cambodia has fulfilled her obligations as a signatory of the Geneva Agreement and has chosen the path of "independence and peaceful co-existence".

(e) There has been a general easing of tensions between Cambodia and its neighbours which, although not of direct concern to the Commission, provides less excuse for the Cambodian Government wishing the Commission to remain.

In addition to these reasons, which complement our earlier reasons, we think it important, particularly at this time, to be able to provide an illustration that international operations of this kind, in which both Canada and India have participated and in which we might be called upon to take part again, can be officially concluded when the task involved has been completed. There is some justifiable feeling on the part of Canadians that once we get into a temporary international body of this kind it tends to become more and more permanent. We think it would be useful, therefore, to be able to point to an International Commission which has successfully accomplished the work assigned to it and has then been dissolved without attempting to perpetuate itself.

Because of these reasons we are proposing to instruct our Commissioner in Phnom Penh to ask for a vote on the dissolution resolution early in the New Year. In doing so, however, we would like to have Indian agreement and support. We would be grateful, therefore, if the Indian Government would give very careful consideration to the arguments we have presented and would be kind enough to indicate to us as soon as possible what attitude it will take when we call for the vote.

DISSOLUTION OF CAMBODIAN COMMISSION

At Desai's request I called on him on February 6 to receive the Indian Government's reply to our memorandum December 20. He gave the reply orally.

2. He said I would not repeat not be surprised to learn that the Indian Government was not repeat not prepared to support a resolution to dissolve the Commission. Their conclusion was based on what he knew would appear to us to be a realistic, pedantic interpretation of Article 25. Moreover, it was now clear that Sihanouk wanted the Commission to continue. He indeed wanted the Commission to undertake tasks outside of the Agreement and the Indian representative had, under instruction, told him that India would not repeat not support any extension of activity which could not repeat not be brought within the four corners of the Agreement.

3. I said that it seemed to me that the logical conclusion of the Indian position was that any one of the four parties to the armistice agreements could keep all three Commissions in existence in perpetuity, the parties being France, Laos, Cambodia and DLVN. Was not repeat not this absurd? Alternatively, his argument seemed to lead to the conclusion that any one of the three members of the Commissions — India, Poland, Canada — could keep all three Commissions in existence in perpetuity.

4. I pressed him hard on the various ways one or more of the Commissions might be dissolved and ultimately got from him the interpretation that there were three methods (1) all three Commissions could, under Article 25, unanimously decide to dissolve themselves simultaneously (2) one Commission might, by unanimous vote, recommend to the two Co-Chairmen that it be dissolved and if the Co-Chairmen approved of this recommendation they themselves would recommend it to the Geneva Conference Powers. The consent of the parties to that particular armistice agreement would not repeat not be required (3) the two Co-Chairmen could take the initiative in recommending to the Geneva Conference Powers that one or more of the Commissions be dissolved.

5. I commented that the third method might be brought into operation by one or two members of a Commission informing the Co-Chairmen that in their opinion the time had come to dissolve a Commission.

6. I said that his reply to me had been in legal terms and did not repeat not meet our contention that the Commission in Cambodia no repeat no longer had any useful work to do. Desai replied that my comment was not repeat not accurate since the Indian position was based not repeat not only on their interpretation of Article 25 that all three Commissions are related, but also on two other factors, the first the attitude of Sihanouk who wanted the Cambodian Commission to continue, and the second the attitude of the DLVN whom he knew would want the Cambodian Commission to continue. Moreover, it was not repeat not correct to state that the Commission had nothing to do — it still had responsibilities under Article 7 of the Armistice Agreement.

7. Since I was pretty sure that his reference to Article 7 was merely made as a debating point, I went on to argue that if India felt as we did, that there was no repeat no longer any useful work for the Commission to do, it could, while being consistent with its legal interpretation of the Agreement, attempt to persuade Sihanouk, the DLVN and the Poles to agree to the dissolution of the Commission. He was vague in his reply to this but gave me the impression that the Indians, if pressed on this point, would claim that this would be inappropriate action for them to take, as Chairman of the Commission. He finally said that it was "hopeless" for us to try to persuade India to change its position on the dissolution of the Cambodian Commission.

8. In an obvious effort to end on a constructive note, Desai said that India would be prepared to lend full support to efforts by us to reduce the strength of the Commission to a bare minimum. The minimum would consist of two officers so that if one got ill there would be one to take his place. This would mean for Canada a reduction from our present level of five officers to two. He reminded me that in order to get a reduction of activities to make a reduction of strength possible we would need unanimous agreement of the three members of the Commission and that if we wanted to pursue this line we would presumably want to get India to try to persuade the Poles to reduce their strength to two officers.[74]

SECRET [Ottawa], February 21, 1956

IMPLEMENTATION OF CEASE-FIRE RESOLUTION IN LAOS

You will recall that shortly after your return to Ottawa last November, I submitted for your approval a draft telegram on the subject, "Laos: Political Objectives". In this telegram to our High Commissioner in London (No. Y-1958 of December 5[75]) we examined the likelihood of increased pressure by the Royal Government for restoration of its authority over Phong Saly and Sam Neua provinces, after the December 25 elections. We anticipated the possibility that the Government might declare that, having made a sincere effort to reach a political settlement with the Pathet Lao within the recognized time limit, it had discharged its obligations under the Geneva Agreement by holding general elections. The logical projection of this line of argument would be an assertion that the Pathet Lao after the elections had no further right to sanctuary in Phong Saly and Sam Neua under Article 14, and a demand for restoration of RLG authority over these provinces by military means.

2. In the face of this possibility we decided in effect that some limits must be set on the extent of our support for the Royal Government's restoration demands. To persuade the Indians to carry on in the Vietnam Commission in support of the armistice, despite the apparent remoteness of the political settlement there, we would have to be somewhat tolerant of their seeking a similar separation of the military from the political settlement in Laos. That is, we should have to consider sympathetically their argument that the Commission's job in Laos was to maintain the existing cease-fire line, while continuing to aim to achieve unification by peaceful means. In any event, it appeared likely that RLG efforts to dislodge the Pathet Lao by force would fail, and that resumption of hostilities in Laos with open Vietminh intervention would upset the cease-fire in Vietnam. With these considerations in mind, we recognized that it would be undesirable to push our promotion of the Royal Government's sovereign rights over Phong Saly and Sam Neua to the point where there would be risk of resumed hostilities, even if this reservation meant that military partition of Laos might continue for some time.

3. These views were discussed with British, French and United States officials, and proved to be generally acceptable to them. They have remained the fundamental principles on which our actions in the Laos Commission have been based. The continuing force of Articles 14 and 19 "pending a political settlement" has been recognized. In the hope of retaining Indian support for our views on political settlement we have remained receptive to Indian efforts to achieve effective Commission action to stabilize the military situation.

4. An Indian resolution recommending that the Commission's Military Committee should define the areas in which the troops of the Royal Government were located in Phong Saly and Sam Neua provinces, bearing in mind the nature of military control, size of posts and considerations of local supply and maintenance, was passed by the International Commission on April 20, 1955. The Polish delegate refused to vote on it, and never recognized its passage. This resolution was rejected by both the Pathet Lao and the Royal Government, and no effort was made by the Commission to enforce its provisions. During the early summer the Commission attempted to secure resumption of military negotiations between the two parties, and meetings finally were resumed on July 15, with the International Commission's Military Committee in attendance. The objects of these negotiations were, first, to settle the Muong Peun dispute, and then to draw up a plan for a permanent military settlement. The discussions made little significant progress, and were completely deadlocked before the parties went to Rangoon in early October. The Rangoon Cease-Fire Agreement of October 11, which was not tied to any agreement on a political settlement and was signed by the Royal Government against our private advice, was the first of the various cease-fire arrangements between the parties which officially committed the Government to accept establishment of a continuous neutral zone with concretely demarcated limits. The International Commission took note of this provision in its cease-fire resolution of December 9.[76] It recommended that the Commission's Military Committee, in consultation with the parties, should draw up proposals for demarcation lines separating the opposing forces, basing its deliberations on the Rangoon Agreement and the Joint Minutes covering the pre-Rangoon military talks (signed by the parties on October 28).

5. The Military Committee's proposals constitute the demarcation arrangements which the Indian draft resolution now before the Commission seeks to formalize as a recommendation to the parties. The line proposed is not less favourable to the Royal Government than that of which (in our opinion) the RLG implied its acceptance by signing the Rangoon Agreement. If the Government failed to accept the demarcation resolution now, it would be laying itself open to Indian charges of breach of faith. This and other arguments in favour of our supporting the draft resolution were enumerated in our telegram Y-37 of February 8 to Vientiane, which also outlined the possible arguments for voting against the resolution. On balancing the pros and cons, we concluded that we probably should have to support the demarcation resolution in the end, because of:

(a) our earlier commitments;

(b) our desire to retain Indian support for our views on the political settlement;

(c) the necessity to avoid the possibility of being accused of frustrating the Commission's efforts to prevent resumption of hostilities; and

(d) the desirability of having a clear demarcation line behind which the Pathet Lao would be confined, should the Commission be compelled to withdraw before a political settlement is reached.

6. In conveying this advice to Mr. Bridle, we suggested that when the resolution was introduced he might introduce amendments embodying our reservations. When these were defeated, he could then agree to vote for the recommendation, at that time making the point that if it were rejected by either side, he could not support anything more than a factual report to the Co-Chairmen.

7. It is along these lines that our Commissioner has been participating in the current discussion of the demarcation resolution, with the intention of ultimately voting for it. However, the attitude of grave concern which is the official French reaction to the draft text, and the reservations with which it has been received in Washington, apparently make it desirable to review our position again before we commit ourselves finally.

8. The Quai d'Orsay has confined itself to expressing concern in general terms over the implications of the demarcation resolution and makes no detailed suggestions for improving it. (Telegram 113 of February 19† refers.) French failure to protest during the several months that demarcation proposals have been under discussion is explained by saying that the idea of a demarcation line as such was not necessarily unacceptable, but that the Quai must object to the Commission's recommendations as set forth in the draft resolution. They apparently see no harm in the Commission suggesting demarcation arrangements to the parties, provided no attempt is made to impose a particular demarcation line. (This bears some resemblance to our own desire to have the Commission's action in the form of a proposal, rather than a recommendation — which change we already have tried to obtain without success.) The French raise particularly strong objections to the reference, in paragraph VIII of the draft, to the possibility of an appeal to the Co-Chairmen should either party reject the resolution. They urge that any action by the Commission which opens the way for a reference to the Co-Chairmen is unfortunate from the viewpoint of governments anxious to avoid re-convocation of the Geneva Powers, in that such appeals tend to support the Chinese Communist call for a new conference. The Quai also questions the competence of the Commission to invoke Article 36 with a view to compelling compliance with recommendations such as are embodied in the demarcation resolution. Article 36, it is argued, was meant to enable the Commission to report violations of the Geneva Agreement itself, rather than refusals of the parties to accept Commission recommendations which amount (as the French claim the demarcation recommendation does) to addition of new elements to the Agreement. There is no indication as to whether the French will translate their objections to the resolution into advice to the Royal Government to reject it.

9. The State Department's view (Washington telegram 270 of February 16†) is that we should not support a demarcation resolution in the form now before the Commission. It opposes the whole idea of a demarcation line because it considers this a dangerous concession to the Pathet Lao. However, if the demarcation issue must be faced, the State Department would consider the setting of demarcation lines acceptable only after concrete steps had been taken towards implementing the political resolution of January 7. Given some evidence that the Pathet Lao would agree to implement the political resolution, the United States would turn the full weight of its influence towards the achievement of an effective cease-fire. By implication, we assume that if the demarcation resolution is passed in its present form, the United States will urge the Royal Government to make its acceptance conditional upon the establishment of some working connection between the demarcation resolution and the political resolution of January 7.[77]

10. The Foreign Office in effect has promised full British support for our original plan of ultimately voting for the resolution, after expressing our reservations in proposed amendments and statements for the record. (London telegram 157 of February 16† refers.) Lord Talbot will be instructed not only to advise the Royal Government to accept the demarcation resolution, but also to explain to Katay why (in the U.K. view) the Canadian Commissioner has to support the resolution.

11. The instructions contained in our telegram Y-37 of February 8, concluding that Bridle should support a resolution on a demarcation line, were sent before we received the text of Sen's draft resolution contained in Vientiane telegram 64 of February 11.† It would be possible, although somewhat embarrassing to Bridle, for us to take the line that our instructions did not authorize Bridle to go as far as the Sen draft. We could still support the demarcation line but only as

(a) a proposal to the parties and not as a recommendation, and

(b) a provisional basis for Commission efforts to secure implementation of Article 19.

12. A telegram in the sense of the preceding paragraph is attached for your consideration. The alternative is to authorize Bridle to vote for the Sen draft after proposing amendments and making a statement to make our views clear as indicated in telegram Y-37. If you wish, Holmes, Menzies and I might discuss this question with you.

IMPLEMENTATION OF CEASE FIRE RESOLUTION — LAOS

Your telegram under reference and earlier telegrams have proven most helpful in presenting the pros and cons of the demarcation line issue.

2. As we see it the main arguments in favour of our supporting the proposed demarcation line recommendation are:

(a) If hostilities are to be effectively stopped a clearly defined cease fire line is necessary.

(b) Whether they now like it or not the Royal Government officially committed themselves to the demarcation line principle at Rangoon, if not in the October 28 minutes. There would be some justification therefore for the Indian contention that their failure to accept it now would be a breach of good faith.

[78] Voir/See United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmnd. 314, Third Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Laos, 1 July, 1955-16 May, 1957, London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1957, pp. 46-47.

(c) We have previously committed ourselves to support the idea of a demarcation line slightly less favourable than the one now proposed.

(d) In view of the Indian insistence on making such a recommendation we might lose their support on the more vital political issues at a later stage.

3. The main arguments which might be put forward in favour of our voting against a demarcation line recommendation appear to be:

(a) A Royal Government acceptance of a demarcation line recommended by the Commission while there is no political settlement in sight would have the effect of giving a form of official blessing to a de facto permanent partition. Partition of Laos is not envisaged in the Geneva Agreement and for the Commission to formally recommend a demarcation line at this stage would tend to confirm the status quo which is what the Pathet Lao, in view of their obvious intention of not wanting to reach a political settlement, appear to want.

(b) A rigid demarcation line would prevent the Royal Government from winning over by peaceful persuasive methods the sympathies of the population in the Northern provinces. An acceptance by it of a demarcation line might have unfortunate political implications throughout the rest of the country.

(c) The line as drawn up does not provide the LNA with entirely satisfactory defensive positions.

4. Weighing of the pros against cons leads us to the conclusion that we will probably have to end up supporting the demarcation line recommendation because of:

(a) our earlier commitments;

(b) the desirability of retaining Indian support for our views on the political side;

(c) the undesirability of putting ourselves in a position whereby we could be accused, justly or unjustly, of frustrating an attempt by the Commission to prevent hostilities.

5. Another more long range factor which brings us to this conclusion is that if for any reason the Commission should be compelled to withdraw from Laos before a political settlement is reached it would appear to be in the Royal Government's interest to have a clear demarcation line drawn in agreement with the Pathet Lao in order to contain the latter and any Vietminh assistance to a limited area.

6. Before finally voting for the recommendation, however, you may wish to consider the plan of action outlined below. You will realize of course that these are only suggestions which appear to us to have considerable merit and you may find it necessary or desirable to modify them, according to the changing situations on the spot:

(a) When demarcation recommendation is introduced, presumably by the Indians, you might introduce an amendment which would include the time limit concept and would emphasize the dependence of the military issue on the political realities. We have noted that you are attempting, with little success, to persuade Sen to change the recommendation to a proposal. As we have always taken the view that in the light of Article 36 there is a clear distinction between a proposal and a recommendation from the Commission you might include this suggestion in your amendment. In this way you may have some success in getting Sen to make it clear on the record what he told you confidentially about not considering the demarcation line recommendation as coming under Article 36. We think it is very important to have Sen's views on this in the official minutes to forestall:

(i) a possible deliberate misunderstanding by the Poles when a report to the Co-Chairmen is made;

(ii) a change of attitude on the part of Sen which might be brought about by later instructions from New Delhi or possible annoyance with the RLG's response to the recommendation.

The introduction of your amendment would give you an opportunity to present a full statement of our views for the record.

(b) If your amendment is defeated, as it undoubtedly would be, you might then agree to vote for the demarcation recommendation. In stating your intention to vote for the recommendation you could make the point that you won't agree to associating yourself with anything more than a factual report to the Co-Chairmen should either side turn down the recommendation. This might elicit from Sen the statement on the recommendation in relation to Article 36 mentioned in the preceding paragraph.

(c) You might privately advise the Royal Government of our view that it would be in its best interests to accept the recommendation, possibly with certain qualifications, rather than reject it outright. If the final demarcation recommendation embodies the formula outlined in paragraph 2 of your telegram under reference an acceptance might be less difficult for the R.L.G. In any event we think it would place it in a better light even if when accepting R.L.G. should make reservations, possibly to the effect that:

(i) The R.L.G. has accepted and is prepared to abide by the cease fire resolution of December 9;

(ii) It has and will continue to uphold Article 19 but cannot be held responsible for any limited military action which might prove necessary if there are breaches of the December 9 resolution and Article 19 by the Pathet Lao;

(iii) The R.L.G. can only accept the line as provisional and not as a recognition of the present de facto partition of its country which has resulted from Pathet Lao intransigence on the political side.

A qualified acceptance by the R.L.G. along these lines would make it more difficult for the Indians to accuse it of complete nonco-operation. If in its qualified acceptance it includes a careful and complete restatement of its position, it would also ensure that the R.L.G.'s views were included in any ensuing report to the Co-Chairmen. Inclusion of these qualifications would, of course, be preferable in the recommendation itself but this is unlikely. We think however, you might like to consider outlining them in the statement you make when introducing our amendment.

(d) Should the R.L.G. not accept the recommendation, or should the Indians and Poles decide that a qualified acceptance is not good enough, you should make every effort to ensure that our full views are either embodied in any report made to the Co-Chairman or, if you cannot succeed in reaching agreement on this, submit a minority report after having reached the maximum agreement.

7. During conversations with Foreign Office officials who accompanied Eden and Lloyd during their visit to Ottawa it was agreed that the Foreign Office would caution the Indians against pressing for recommendations which would have the effect of formalizing the de facto partition of Laos.[79] This advice was included in the oral communication to Nehru the text of which has been transmitted to you.[80] In view of this there is possibility that Foreign Office may not advise Talbot to suggest to Royal Government that they accept recommendation. Should Indians not heed U.K. suggestion, which they probably won't at this late date, Talbot may still wish to advise Royal Government to accept recommendation as lesser evil. You may wish to discuss this possibility with him.

8. It would seem to us that the principal thing to strive for, if our support of the recommendation seems inevitable, is that it is clearly placed on the record, preferably the public record if the Commission should decide to make a press release, that the dominating factor in the present Laotian problem is the failure of the Pathet Lao to accept the Commission's proposals regarding restoration of the R.L.G. administration in Phong Saly and Sam Neua and that the real bad faith is on the Pathet Lao's side. It is the Pathet Lao position which has caused the Royal Government to have fears about partition of their country and has prevented the realization of the aims of the Geneva Conference.

LAOS: IMPLEMENTATION OF CEASE FIRE RESOLUTION

I have reviewed the instructions in our telegram No. Y-37 of February 8 in the light of:

(a) Sen's draft resolution forwarded in your telegram No. 64 of February 11;

(b) comments of interested governments on this draft;

(c) position, as I understand it, that we and your delegation have taken regarding this matter;

(d) undesirability of strengthening Pathet Lao claim to separate de facto administration in two Northern provinces in the absence of any evidence of progress toward implementation of political resolution of January 7; and [80] Non retrouvé./Not located.

[81] Voir/See Document 610.

I have concluded that Sen's draft goes much farther than it was our intention to authorize you to go in our Y-37 which was sent before draft was received.

2. Having in mind the history of Commission effort to ensure an effective cease fire in the Northern provinces, and in the light of the Pathet Lao rejection of the political resolution of January 7, it is my considered view that the Commission resolution on implementation of the cease fire resolution of December 9, should provide at this stage for something less than a take-it-or-leave it recommendation with the threat of reference to the Co-Chairmen under Article 36. I consider that the present situation calls for Commission action which will maintain and if possible advance the measure of agreement reached between the parties regarding a cease fire but not go so far as to court rejection with the consequent upset that it might entail to the present degree of military stability achieved.

3. Accordingly, I think that the Commission should confine itself at this stage to a resolution:

(a) conveying formally to the RLG and the FUPL the proposals of the Military Committee (which we have not yet seen) or proposals based on these as a basis for the renewal of discussions in the Joint Military Committee provided for in Article 5 of the Rangoon Agreement looking toward direct agreement between the parties; and

(b) adopting the proposals of the Military Committee, insofar as agreement has been reached, pending the conclusion of a direct agreement between the RLG and the FUPL, as the provisional basis on which the Commission will endeavour to secure the cooperation of the RLG and the FUPL in the implementation of Article 19 for an initial period of 60 days subject to review during the second 30 days of this period on the basis of views conveyed to the Military Committee by the military representatives of the RLG and FUPL.

4. Since the Pathet Lao did not accept the political resolution of January 7 it is important that the key clauses should be repeated in this resolution so that the Pathet Lao cannot use this military resolution as a means of achieving the de facto division of Laos while disputing the Commission's views regarding the unity of Laos and the sovereign right of the Royal Government to establish its administration in the Northern provinces. A sentence should also be included indicating the belief that progress in implementing the political settlement will reduce tension and the cause of hostilities. It is principally Pathet Lao intransigence and not the sporadic shooting incidents which has delayed the political settlement.

5. I would be grateful if you would speak to Sen privately first and explain that I have personally given this matter most serious consideration. We share Indian concern over continuing hostilities in the Northern provinces. We consider that the formula in paragraph 3 will strengthen and advance the measure of agreement achieved so far and the basis for future Commission action in ensuring implementation of Article 19. We are frankly concerned, however, about the ground that would be lost if Sen's draft resolution were adopted and rejected by either party. We are also concerned that the Pathet Lao, having in fact rejected the political resolution and other Commission and RLG efforts to give practical effect to the principles of sovereignty and unity of Laos, will use what Sen intends as a purely military resolution as a means of effectively partitioning Laos and confirming their exclusive civil as well as military control of the area behind the demarcation line. I realize that these views will require the complete recasting of Sen's draft resolution, but I cannot see my way clear to authorizing you to vote for Sen's resolution in its present form. If he insists on an early vote on his draft, you should speak in Commission along lines outlined in paragraphs 2-4 above, and then abstain on vote.

6. I would be grateful for your comments and a redraft of resolution incorporating views in paragraphs 2-4.

7. Please wire us and Delhi if you wish High Commissioner to convey my views in paragraphs 2-5 to Indian authorities.

8. Delhi, London, Washington, Paris: Above is for your information only pending reply from Bridle. You may say that we are still exchanging views with our Commissioner to see what improvements can be effected in Sen's draft resolution.

LAOS: REPORT TO CO-CHAIRMEN ON POLITICAL RESOLUTION[82]

Your efforts, to secure a strong report and clear statement of Canadian position, are appreciated. We think, however, that in view of the understanding we had here with the United Kingdom officials who accompanied Eden on his visit to Ottawa, that the U.K. would send a strong note to Molotov concerning the Pathet Lao rejection, and give it publicity, it might be helpful if we made a few comments on the report which may assist you in the preparation of future reports to the Co-Chairmen. You will understand that this is not intended as a criticism of your efforts and that we are fully aware of the very real difficulties you face in the Commission when drafting these reports. What we hope to do is to assist you, by reviewing the report under reference, in having your contributions to the majority sections, and the Canadian minority sections, phrased with greater regard to the way in which these reports may be used as a basis for:

(a) diplomatic initiative;

(b) public enlightenment internationally and in Laos;

(c) the historical record.

2. We think you will agree that, in looking at the report with these points in mind, it is somewhat disappointing. The following aspects in particular strike us as unsatisfactory, especially if looked at from the United Kingdom Government's position at the time when the report is received:

(a) first paragraph does not include quotable summary of the provisions and objectives of the political resolution;

[82] Voir/See United Kingdom, Parliamentary Papers, Cmnd. 314, Third Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Laos, 1 July, 1955-16 May, 1957, London: Her Majesty's Stationery Office, 1957, pp. 49-52.

(b) there is no agreed statement of majority Indian and Canadian view;

(c) Canadian statement does not deal with substance of political resolution and does not explain why "it fell somewhat short of what the Canadian delegation felt was required under the circumstances" or indicate what features we feel "might possibly lead to misunderstanding";

(d) Polish minority view was given first;

(e) the delay in transmitting the report has enabled Russians to seize the initiative in bringing forward Souphanavong's letter (you might wish to ask Talbot to show you telegram No. 162 of February 20 from Moscow to Foreign Office and Foreign Office telegrams 164 and 165 of February 24 to Moscow, if he has not already done so.)

3. Suitable summary of political resolution might have provided usable quotation for United Kingdom Co-Chairman and for public information purposes and would have constituted minimum positive statement if agreed majority statement could not have been worked out with the Indians.

4. We think you should put pressure on Sen, when further reports are being prepared, to include a majority statement whenever possible giving the area of Canadian and Indian agreement. In the report under reference there is no majority statement that could have been used by the United Kingdom Co-Chairman as a supporting quotation in complaining to Soviet Co-Chairman regarding Pathet Lao non-acceptance.

5. If it is not possible to get an agreed majority statement the Canadian statement might well be more vigorous. In the latest report it seems to us that the Canadian paragraph deals too much with the background of adoption of the resolution instead of with the substance of the resolution and what the rejection of it by the Pathet Lao augurs for the future.

6. The letter to the Pathet Lao is satisfactory, as we recognize that any effort to blame the Pathet Lao at that stage would probably have resulted in lengthy statements of positions by three delegations.

7. You will note in Foreign Office telegram 165 (see paragraph 2(e) above) to Moscow that the United Kingdom Government has suggested to the Soviet Government that a message be sent to the International Commission in Laos, through the Indian Government, asking for the Commission's views on letters addressed to the Commission by the Royal Government and to the Co-Chairmen through the Commission by Souphannouvong. It would seem to us that the report on these letters would provide us with an excellent opportunity to get the facts of Pathet Lao lack of cooperation and failure to implement the agreement squarely on the record in a way in which the United Kingdom could use them for diplomatic and publicity ends. In order to refute Souphannouvong's contentions that the R.L.G. are to blame for the situation in Laos, we think it would be a good idea to prepare a summary of the findings of the Commission on all investigations completed since the time of cease-fire. Such a summary would, we think, show quite clearly who is largely to blame for the troubles in the two Northern provinces. In this respect you may be able to make use of papers already prepared by you concerning Pathet Lao behaviour at Houei Thao and elsewhere.

8. We have examined with interest the draft of the special report under cover of your despatch No. 64 of February 15† and our comments will be in a following telegram.†

9. We believe that we have a strong case in Laos which needs to be vigorously pushed partly in order to balance less satisfactory situation in Vietnam. We want you to know that you will have our support for taking an even stronger line in Commission reports. We would also welcome your telegraphic suggestions in each case as to how United Kingdom Co-Chairman might exploit reports. No doubt our suggestions, as seen from this distance, as to how reports might be improved will seem less practicable on the spot, and it would be helpful for our own guidance to have in due course your comments and suggestions.

IMPLEMENTATION OF CEASE FIRE RESOLUTION

Commission action is still in suspense. Sen and I have had no recent discussions and we are awaiting Delhi's further reaction towards views conveyed by our High Commissioner. I see no reason for us to press the Indians on this. Now that a new government has been formed Sen may wish to move forward but so far has taken no initiative.

2. You will recall that during the stage prior to receipt of your Y58 of February 22 we had been endeavouring to secure agreement in the Military Commission to a corridor which would allow the LNA to retain two important posts. This involved negotiation with the Poles who said they would consult the FUPL. It also involved securing confirmation from our team that a track which would make such a corridor feasible exists on the ground. So far the team has been prevented from sending a conclusive report because of the helicopter difficulties. The Polish attitude suggests that they are most unlikely to agree even if they are satisfied that a track exists. They say the Pathet Lao are in any case reluctant to accept any corridor through which they would not have access.

3. Because our current discussion on the resolution is only with the Indians and since we do not yet know what the outcome will be I have said nothing about our views to the Poles. I do not think that, when the time comes to do this, the long standing negotiations with them over the corridor will reach any special problem.

4. The present Polish attitude toward the resolution is curious. In the early stages they pressed strongly for a demarcation line. However, they have in no way protested about the delay of the past month or so and have seemed rather quiescent. However, I still have no reason to think that they will modify their advocacy of a resolution on an even more rigid basis than that proposed by Sen.

5. Our information through LNA channels is that the army will seek government approval for a modestly stepped up programme of military action against the Pathet Lao. I am satisfied that any favourable decision the Government might reach on such a proposal would be only in terms of action sometime after the discussions between the Co-Chairmen, (group corrupt) that the question of actual implementation would depend on the extent to which the RLG derived some satisfaction from these discussions.

6. When I called on Souvanna Phouma, the new Prime Minister, yesterday he asked me about Commission action. Our conversation was mostly about the problem of a political settlement but I also mentioned the draft cease fire resolution and told him roughly where (group corrupt) stands in the Commission. I made a suitable reference in the broadest terms to our attitude which is in any case well known to him, but without reference to our current discussions with the Indians. He said, because the Pathet Lao had not accepted the January 7 resolution, he greatly doubted if the RLG could accept a demarcation line resolution. He said nothing about possible accepting with suitable reservations and went on to suggest that separation of the forces might now be achieved by the setting up of neutral zones around LNA posts until after the Co-Chairmen have completed their discussions. This, he said, would ensure stability without setting up a potential dividing line. We will study the feasibility of this project from the military point of view. Even if feasible I doubt if it would satisfy the Indians and Poles if it were to be for as short and definitive a period as Souvanna suggested. You may, however, wish to consider his proposal. So far I have not mentioned it to Sen or to any of our friends here.

SPECIAL REPORTS TO THE CO-CHAIRMEN AND THE QUESTION OF A POLITICAL SETTLEMENT

I shall do my best to make the special report under the January 7 resolution reflect the views in your telegrams under reference, which largely coincide with the views I have myself been expressing to Sen. At the same time I would like you to understand the difficulties which attend this exercise.

2. Most of the points in your Y65 were in my mind when the letter covering the resolution and related documents was being prepared. The simple explanation of its paleness is that we reached a point when further discussion would have borne little, if any, fruit and would have imposed a dangerous delay. As it was through no fault of this delegation, more than a month elapsed between agreement on the text and receipt by the Co-Chairmen.

3. The same difficulties beset the special report. As I have indicated in previous messages, the Indian attitude toward implementation of the January 7 resolution is different from ours. They do not resile from its assertions but its main appeal to them was its calling for further talks; they still regard talks as the only possible path to a settlement, and it seems they will continue to give active support to the resolutions only to the extent that, in their view, it will facilitate rather than hinder progress toward talks.

4. As you know from my earlier reports, Sen believes the Pathet Lao, and those who "advise" them, might be interested in a settlement. The RLG would take some step to assert their capacity for independent action — ie, without giving up the substance of the United States idea, adopt a somewhat neutral orientation. He is informally exploring the possibility of (group corrupt) such idea, especially if raised by the Russians in London, having some appeal for the RLG. I have told him, apart from the merits or demerits of such an approach, I can see no reason why his idea should deter the Indians from joining us in continuing support of the January 7 resolution. He agrees we should not go back on it but argues in favour of these parties being encouraged to see each other's point of view.

5. Another consideration which we agree, though unspoken, with Sen is the Indians' desire not to be associated with material in the report which, in their judgment, would be used by one side or the other as part of a diplomatic propaganda offensive. They have always distinguished between passage of the resolution per se and use of it or reports related to it for purposes of this kind. They have noted the various ways in which the resolution and related documents have already been used for such purposes and are not anxious to provide more material of the same kind.

6. Since sending my telegram under reference I have encountered a procedural difficulty which rises essentially from the point of view described in paragraph five. From the start even the Poles have expressed doubts about the special report, and the guidance expected from Warsaw for the past six weeks has simply not been forthcoming. We will probably know their attitude when the new Commissioner arrives on April 2. They will either have extreme views on contents or oppose sending the report at all. This, and what he knows of our views, causes Sen to be apprehensive lest the report be difficult to put into final form. He has argued from this that it might be of doubtful value.

7. Lately he has gone further than this and suggested that, since it seems possible that the Russians might try to put off discussion of Laos on the grounds that the special report has not yet been received, discussion now by the Commission before the London talks might seem an effort to assist the United Kingdom Co-Chairman. He concedes that continued failure to submit would seem, even more, to be an effort to assist the Russians. But he does not like what he regards as this "dilemma" and wishes the Co-Chairmen would reach a decision to discuss Laos and so inform the Commission at an early date. I believe he is now discussing the question raised in this paragraph with his government.

8. I argue that we are obliged to send the special report and that, if necessary, the Polish attitude can be disregarded; that the report is long overdue and that the Commission would be remiss if it failed to submit it before the London talks; that, as matters stand, the Co-Chairmen have material from the parties which is rather weighted with Pathet Lao propaganda and that the Commission has a duty to get this in perspective; and that the Co-Chairmen have a right to expect the Commission to give them the best possible guidance before they discuss the Laotian problem.

9. It is evident that the RLG are looking, perhaps somewhat too hopefully, toward the London discussions, which they assume will cover Laos. Both Souvanna and Katay indicated, when I saw them last week, that the RLG would take no separate initiative pending the London meeting. The Prime Minister asked me to request my Government to use its influence with the Co-Chairmen to persuade them that the Pathet Lao should be told, perhaps via the Chinese or Vietminh, that the January 7 resolution should be implemented. Souvanna is speaking in similar terms to the British, Americans and French here, as well as to Sen and to the Polish representative.

10. Much of the above applies, mutatis mutandis, to the proposed commentary on the letters. I shall be guided in this connection by your telegrams under reference and shall consult you further if time allows, both with respect to the commentary and with respect to the report. Sen left for Hong Kong yesterday but has agreed to work with me on both immediately on his return on April 2. To expedite despatch he has agreed to transmission by telegram. I am fairly confident that I can get these documents sent in time; as to their content, I shall do my best and shall concentrate on a maximum area of Canadian-Indian agreement, except where dissent is essential, in order that, to the extent possible, they may give the effect of a report from the Commission.

DRAFT SPECIAL REPORT

The following is the text of the draft Special Report to the Co-Chairmen agreed to by the three Commissioners this morning. Begins:

Sir, in view of the forthcoming meeting in London of the Co-Chairmen of the Geneva Conference on Indochina and also of the fact that the Third Interim Report covering the time up to December 31, 1955 is not yet available to the Co-Chairmen, we give below an account, in broad outline, of the present situation in Laos. This report also disposes of the action contemplated in the sixth paragraph of my letter of 15 February, addressed to the Co-Chairmen. We hope that this report may be of some assistance to the Co-Chairmen if they discuss the problem of Laos, particularly in view of the letters from the parties forwarded by the Commission to the Co-Chairmen, and that in this event they may be able to put forward their views as to the line which could most profitably be pursued in the endeavour to reach a final and equitable solution.

2. At the root of most of the difficulties in the Laotian problem lie divergent interpretations of Articles 14 and 19 of the Cease-Fire Agreement held by the RLG and the PL. The Commission, although recognizing the need for an authoritative interpretation of the Articles, has so far been unable to find the necessary measure of agreement. The points at issue are:

(a) The PL claim that, pending "a political settlement" the whole of the provinces of Phong Saly and Sam Neua with the connecting corridor form their final regroupment zone. The RLG do not accept this view and maintain that, as the sovereign authority, their rights in these provinces are unimpaired except that the forces of one party should not commit any "hostile act" against those of the other.

(b) Whether the "political settlement" anticipated in Article 14 was intended to take place, as the RLG claim, before the statutory general elections of 1955, or whether, as the PL appear to claim, that while "political settlement" was desirable as soon as possible it must be based on agreement to be reached after due discussion between the parties on equal terms and without any specific time limit.

3. Throughout the summer of 1955 negotiations for a political settlement took place between the parties centering largely around the associated problems of the restoration of the Royal administration and general elections. The Pathet Lao desired certain changes in the electoral law, only some of which the Royal Government were prepared to accept. The Royal Government maintained that under the existing laws they could not accept principal demands of the Pathet Lao for votes for women, reduction in the qualifying age of candidates and the setting up of joint central committees for elections. The Royal Government's insistence that the establishment of administration in the two Northern provinces should take place before the elections, countered by the Pathet Lao demand that such establishment should follow the elections, eventually led to a deadlock.

4. The Royal Government held "general elections" on December 25, 1955. The Pathet Lao did not participate in them. The Commission was not asked to play any part in the elections and it did not adopt any official attitude toward them. However, limited comments on the attitude of the three delegations on this question might be mentioned. The Canadian delegation held the view that these were not contrary to the Geneva Agreement and that the RLG had tried their utmost to reach a political settlement with the PL beforehand and were bound by their own constitution to hold elections some time in 1955. The Polish delegation considered that the elections were not held in conformity with the Geneva Agreement, that the Commission had taken no part in them and had made no comments. The Indian delegation takes the view that the RLG had freedom to hold elections whenever they wished under their own laws but as no political settlement had been reached with the PL and they did not participate in the elections, these elections were not of the type contemplated in the Geneva Settlement.

5. The circumstances in which the Resolution of 7 January was adopted are already known to the Co-Chairmen. My letter of 15 February gave the views of the three delegations on this resolution and also of the reaction of the parties. Since then, the deadlock has remained unbroken. The Pathet Lao addressed a letter to the RLG on March 30, proposing a resumption of the talks for a political settlement. In their reply the RLG stated that it would be desirable to wait for the pronouncement of the Co-Chairmen on the reference made on 7 January Resolution.

6. The military situation in the two Northern provinces of Sam Neua and Phong Saly continued to be unsatisfactory. Numerous clashes occurred between the troops of the Royal Government and the fighting units of Pathet Lao. In their attempt to consolidate scattered posts in the Northern provinces, LNA army extended its control in the intervening territory and in the process they created new posts in the perimeter and have on occasions attacked PL. What is considered "consolidation" by the RLG is viewed as "expansion and attack" by the PL, and they have, from time to time, harassed or attacked RLG posts. In this situation, which is viewed strategically as a whole by both RLG and PL, clashes occurred, particularly in places where the opposing forces are near each other. Owing to transport difficulties, of which the Co-Chairmen are aware, and in particular owing to the shortage of helicopters to be provided by the French Liaison Mission, the Commission has been badly handicapped in carrying out investigations. It has also not always received complete cooperation from either side. In territories controlled by the PL, teams have often not been allowed free movement and were generally unable to question witnesses on their own initiative. The cooperation of the PL with the Commission showed some improvement during recent months, which it is hoped will continue, although on several occasions the men under their command behaved in a manner which invited strong criticism from the Commission. The cooperation of the RLG with the Commission continued to be generally good, although, at times, the behaviour of some of their soldiers at a particular post towards the team was highly unsatisfactory. The Commission has (10 groups missing) strongly remonstrated to the RLG about this recent deterioration which, it is hoped, the Government will put right.

7. If a political settlement is reached between the RLG and the PL, these above mentioned problems can be expected largely to disappear, but meanwhile the Commission must continue to prevent hostilities or any worsening of the military situation to the best of its ability. The Commission's present endeavours in the military field are concentrated on finding a suitable means of implementing the Resolution of December 9, 1955 which was accepted by both sides. The Military Committee, with Canadian reservation, have already drawn up proposals for a suitable demarcation line separating the forces. The Commission hopes to consider these proposals at an early date.

8. A similar telegram has been addressed to H.E. M.V. Molotov/the Rt Hon Selwyn Lloyd MP.

9. I take this opportunity, Sir, to renew to you assurances of our highest consideration at all times. Ends.

LAOS: SPECIAL REPORT

We are pleased that Commission was able to send its Special Report to Co-Chairmen in time to be considered at current meetings in London. We regret that it does not contain the suggestions we and the U.K. made that would have helped Lord Reading to press for implementation of the January 7 political resolution. On the other hand, compared with Sen's original draft this is a great improvement because it is concise and factual. While it does not advance the case for implementation of the January 7 political resolution, it does not lose ground either and also avoids the implication that Sen's demarcation line resolution is the only solution to the continuing military clashes. We hope that the special report will provide a clear statement of the issues that may help Lord Reading to focus his discussions with Mr. Gromyko on essential matters.

2. We are fully aware of the very difficult situation you have been facing and continue to face in trying to get factual and constructive reports from the Laos Commission. Your efforts are appreciated by all of us here and we think you should be congratulated for achieving as much as you have.

PROPOSED RESUMPTION OF POLITICAL TALKS[83]

Since this issue became particularly active toward the end of April, I have continued to act in accordance with the general (group corrupt) outlined in your telegram Y96 April 23.† I have not given the government any positive advice but I have acted closely in concert with and, in a quiet way, in support of the British in relation to the January 7 Resolution. I have also kept in touch with the Americans and the French but have not been associated with any actions which the Americans may have taken.

2. I am inclined to think that in this complex situation, our best course is to maintain a clear idea of the role which we feel the January 7 Resolution should play in the immediate future and to act accordingly in the Commission and in conversation with members of the RLG. The extent to which you would wish me to volunteer positive advice to the RLG, and the nature of any such advice is, however, a question on which I would appreciate your guidance, with particular reference to the point raised in paragraph 3 of my telegram under reference. There would seem to be some advantage in leaving it to the British to take the lead in this; such tactics have apparently succeeded fairly well so far. I am prepared, however, to do whatever may seem wise in future in the light of all the circumstances.

3. We should, of course, continue to consult closely with our friends on this and to maintain a common attitude, particularly with the British. The Americans, I feel sure, will continue to behave correctly and circumspectly but they must inevitably keep a close watch on any trend toward neutralism, lest it go too far, as they seem already inclined toward a gentle (tightening of the reins) to counter the more extreme pulls from the North. This struggle, if it becomes one, is one in which we are very much interested but perhaps indirectly. Our position in Laos is primarily that of a Commission government and our views on the nature of Laos' relations with other countries do not necessarily coincide entirely with those of the Americans.

When Souvanna Phouma returned to office as prime minister in March 1956, he declared that his most important priority was the reintegration of the Pathet Lao and he set about trying to arrange a new round of talks with them.

4. We should also be careful not to act in a way which would involve us in internal political conflict within the Laotian Government.

5. I would be grateful to know if this analysis is in harmony with your thinking.

LAOS: PROPOSED RESUMPTION OF POLITICAL TALKS

Analysis of current Laotian situation contained in your telegram 193 is basically in harmony with our thinking. We agree you should continue to insist that Commission should give maximum support to January 7 Resolution.

2. If UK should be successful in persuading Russians to agree to message which contains essential points of January 7 Resolution without actual reference to it you should, of course, agree that such a message would be suitable basis for resumption of political negotiations. We share UK doubts, however, that Russians will agree.

3. If Prime Minister decides to meet with Souvannavong on personal basis regardless of whether latter accepts January 7 Resolution as basis for discussions we do not think you should raise objections. You might take suitable opportunities, however, to advise Prime Minister against too great optimism and warn him of pitfalls. We find it difficult to think that Souvanna Phouma can be too optimistic in view of his experiences of negotiating with Souvannavong at Khang Khay in September 1953. We realize, however, that family ties play important role in Laotian affairs and that by tradition it is appealing to Prime Minister to attempt settlement on this basis.

4. While we are inclined to doubt wisdom of Americans advising Prime Minister against personal meeting with Souvannavong we also doubt whether we should take any formal steps to give them our views. You might wish to tell Blancke informally that we do not think it would be advantageous to Western interests if it should be known that U.S. formally advised Prime Minister against personal meeting. While Communists would undoubtedly lay blame on us if meeting did not take place regardless of whether U.S. actually interfered we can foresee damaging effects on our relations with Indians unless we are in position to assure them positively that no interference actually took place. We understand U.S. concern and we assume they will weigh pros and cons very carefully before taking decision to advise against personal meeting. If Americans do give such advice we would appreciate their reasons but would not wish to associate ourselves with them.

5. We would appreciate your estimate of Sisouk's pessimistic statement about Communist successes, contained in your telegram No. 203,† which differ from more comfortable assessments we have had since elections.

6. We see advantage in your suggestion that we continue to leave to British to take lead in advising RLG. You should not, however, hesitate to present our views if it appears that RLG wish to receive them.

7. New Delhi. You should take suitable opportunity to advise External Affairs of danger to prestige of Commission inherent in USSR attitude on Laos as outlined in Vientiane telegram 201.† We agree with Bridle that it would not be advisable to suggest to Indian Government that they intervene with USSR unless in conversations there is an indication that Indians would be willing to take this step. When speaking to Indians you might also reaffirm that we are as anxious as they are to see an early settlement in Laos. We would not wish to stand in the way of any possible means of achieving settlement and if Royal Government and Pathet Lao can reach agreement on a satisfactory basis we would welcome it. We think, however, that in absence of any new practical proposals, the Commission should continue to stand by principles of January 7 Resolution if its views are sought by either party. You might also wish to indicate that we do not wish to interfere in Laotian internal politics and that we do not intend to offer any advice to RLG concerning question of their assuming a more neutralist position in world affairs. We think Indians will agree with us, however, that it would be unfortunate if, in their eagerness for a political settlement, the RLG gave away too much, making it possible for Communists to assume preferred position in conduct of Laotian affairs which their numbers and influence do not warrant and which was not envisaged for them at Geneva. If RLG should seek Canadian views on the political negotiations we would consider it in their best interests to advise them along these general lines.

MEETING WITH PATHET LAO

United Kingdom High Commissioner has supplied us with text of communiqué issued by Souvannavong and Souvanna Phouma.[84] We are not too happy with it as it seems to us on first glance that RLG have given away more than they needed to without getting any concrete commitments from Pathet Lao in return. We think it important, however, not to show RLG or Indians that we are displeased with communiqué as true colours of Pathet Lao will only be revealed when two sides get down to discussing details. If Pathet Lao show real desire for settlement during detailed negotiations, there is no point in antagonizing Souvanna Phouma ahead of time. If, as we suspect, they prove unreasonable, this will soon become apparent to RLG and Indians and we will be in better position to put over our own views if, by accepting communiqué at face value, we will have shown that we sincerely hoped for settlement.

2. We were somewhat surprised at report from Holliday, passed to us by UK High Commissioner, that he and Parsons were trying to exert influence on Souvanna Phouma to keep him from adopting a neutral policy for Laos. This is contrary to what we had previously understood the UK position to be, and we are asking our High Commissioner's office in London to ask the Foreign Office for clarification. You also might wish to raise this point informally with Holliday. We were surprised too that Holliday should take somewhat unusual step of handing Souvanna Phouma a suggested draft communiqué prior to commencement of meetings. It seems to us that this might tend to offend and antagonize Prime Minister.

3. If no action has been taken yet we think it would be inadvisable for Commission to countersign communiqué. We would prefer not to have Commission's name on this document and also have grave doubts that such action would come within Commission's terms of reference. As we would not, however, wish to give impression that we are opposed to communiqué, you might suggest to Sen that Commission could take note of it, if necessary with satisfaction, with perhaps some appropriate expression of Commission's hope that it will lead to general settlement.

4. We think you might attempt, without appearing to interfere, to persuade your UK and US colleagues that it might be wiser to refrain at this stage from pressing on Souvanna Phouma their objections and misgivings concerning communiqué. We do not think you should raise question of integration with US Embassy as they already know our general views on the subject. But if your opinion is asked you should give our views along lines of our telegram YY122 of July 25.†

[84] Dans le communiqué daté du 5 août 1956, le Pathet Lao et le gouvernement royal du Laos s'entendaient sur l'utilité de mener une politique étrangère qui suivrait « the path of Peace and Neutrality »; convenaient d'un cessez-le-feu à Sam Neua et à Phong Saly, et promettaient d'examiner la possibilité de tenir des élections libres et de former un gouvernement d'union nationale. In the communiqué dated August 5, 1956 the Pathet Lao and the Royal Laotian Government agreed on the desirability of pursuing a foreign policy which followed "the path of Peace and Neutrality"; agreed to a ceasefire in Sam Neua and Phong Saly; and promised to study the possibility of free elections and the formation of a National Union Government. London: Would you please take suitable opportunity to give our general views to Foreign Office including those points in paragraph 2 above.

PROPOSED SETTLEMENT WITH PATHET LAO

It is argued that, with the RLG committed to certain principles in advance of a substantial settlement and with the [Souvanna] visit to Peking following hard on the Agreement on Principles, the Communists are well on the way to achieving the sort of settlement in Laos which they think best calculated to serve their long term ends. On the other hand, while the RLG has certainly not repeat not had its own way so far and will probably accept some compromise in reaching a substantial settlement they have already resisted certain extreme Pathet Lao demands and may continue to do so. Moreover, it does not repeat not necessarily follow that the Communists will achieve their ends as the result of a settlement or as a consequence of the visit to Peking. In assessing present developments we also have to consider the method and objectives of the RLG in the negotiations, and their long-term intentions and chances of success. While it would be premature to pass judgement at this stage, when I view the matter in this light I do not repeat not feel unduly disturbed by the course of events so far and I welcome the prospect of a settlement.

2. The RLG method in the negotiations has been to create the right atmosphere for them, to go some distance toward satisfying the Pathet Lao on questions of principle, and by this means and other techniques to develop mutual confidence as a basis from which to work out the final settlement. It is their aim, without giving away anything essential, to integrate the Pathet Lao (frankly?) and fully, to restore the Royal administration in the North, and thus to bring about a genuine reconciliation of the Laotian people. Their long-term intentions, so far as these can be ascertained, are to maintain a strong democratic government, to make Laos independent and neutral both with respect to (alliances?) and with respect to foreign interference, and to make the country more prosperous and, ultimately, able to stand on its own feet economically.

3. The RLG chances of success depend on imponderable factors and cannot yet be assessed with certainty. Laos seems clearly to have embarked on a more definite policy on neutrality but I am sure that it is not repeat not the intention of the present leaders to veer toward the Communist Bloc and I am confident that they will continue to do their utmost to make Laos truly independent. The likely development of the internal situation is perhaps the most difficult to predict over a long period. As indicated in my telegram 340† the prospects are that, probably following complementary elections within the next 6 months or so, there will be a national union government including at least one representative of the Pathet Lao. In addition the Pathet Lao will have freedom to pursue their activities through various organizations, and cover action by groups favourable to them will doubtless continue. In assessing the likely affect of all this one must consider, on the one hand, the proven capacity of Communist inspired elements to gain the initiative in Asian countries and, on the other hand, the character of the Laotian people who, in spite of their easy going way, would find Communism a strange doctrine and the potential strength of RLG leadership which, though it needs more drive and is inadequately staffed may well prove more effective than heretofore under the challenge of changing circumstances.

4. At the present time I can throw little further light on the purpose of the visit to Peking as soon as matters had been arranged with the Pathet Lao and that, now that this has been done, it is fitting that he accept the Chinese invitation. I suppose it was at the suggestion of the Chinese that he decided to include in his party the Ministers of Finance and Agriculture. However, he has said he will make no commitments and he evidently does not repeat not contemplate the Chinese intervening on the Pathet Lao issue. He explains the visit by saying that, if you have an abscess, you can either let it fester or do your best to remove it.

5. The RLG party will probably stop in Hanoi on its way back to Vientiane. This will give the Prime Minister an opportunity to talk to DRVN leaders about the alleged frontier violation on the Xieng Khouang border and other matters of interest to the RLG such as DRVN interference. I do not repeat not know to what extent the Prime Minister intends to enlarge the scope of these discussions but I have the impression that he intends them to be relatively limited.

6. Two recent developments are of interest with regard to the Peking and Hanoi visits. We have learned from LNA sources that Vietminh elements have been withdrawn from Sam Neua province and are now being stationed on the Vietnam side of the border. On August 18 the newly appointed Minister for South Vietnam arrived in Laos on a special visit prior to taking up his appointment. I understand he called on the Prime Minister and told him that the South Vietnam Government would be most displeased if the RLG were to accept any economic aid from Communist China and that his government would take steps to prevent any such aid reaching Laos through South Vietnam.

7. When the Joint [PL-RLG] Committees meet they will have several difficult problems to tackle and a settlement is far from assured. An immediate problem may be the maintenance of peaceful conditions during the transitional period (my telegram 337 August 18†). In working for a satisfactory settlement the RLG will have to depend on sound negotiation and, in the last analysis, on Pathet Lao sincerity which has yet to be proven. The only real bargaining counter they have left — freedom not to conclude an agreement if they so choose — has little real meaning because the RLG certainly want a settlement; on the other hand the Pathet Lao seem firmly embarked on their new course and I am inclined to doubt if they now wish to see a settlement frustrated.

8. My present view with regard to the RLG is that what we are witnessing here is more than anything else a (group corrupt) but firm assertion of Laotian nationalism. Although the difficulties facing the RLG both in the balance of the negotiations and in the subsequent period may be formidable, I believe that RLG leaders are acting in what they firmly consider to be the best interests of their country and that they are determined to the best of their ability to lay a sound basis for its future.

9. I hope that the above preliminary assessment may be of assistance to you at this time. When I can offer an appreciation of the significance of the visit to Peking I may forward a further assessment.

USA VIEWS ON PROPOSED PATHET LAO SETTLEMENT AND TREND OF LAOTIAN POLICY

We think it might be worthwhile, when a suitable opportunity presents itself, to let the State Department know, on a very informal basis, Bridle's general views expressed in telegrams under reference and other related telegrams on the desirability of Western countries exercising a good deal of understanding, patience and confidence in their relations with the R.L.G. during the present negotiations.

2. You might say that we fully appreciate apprehension of U.S.A. concerning the present settlement negotiations and general trend of R.L.G. policy. We think, however, that rather than showing apprehension and disapproval it would be better to try to indicate a little more faith and confidence in the R.L.G.'s good intentions and their ability to carry them out successfully. We have no reason to believe that leaders have shifted their orientation in any essential way from the West to the Communist Bloc. Their recent actions most probably stem from a sincere desire to put an end to the crisis which has been dividing their country and from a not unhealthy upsurge of nationalism. The Laotian leaders must in the end be given some latitude to determine the foreign relations of their country with a healthy regard for their geographical situation. While we agree that the trip to Peking may have been premature and that it might have been preferable to have delayed it until the results of the detailed negotiations were known the final test of the R.L.G.'s ability to come through with a settlement which is satisfactory to them and reasonably satisfactory to the West will be in what comes out of the detailed negotiations. A few expressions of encouragement and confidence from their Western friends might therefore serve to strengthen the R.L.G.'s stated determination not to strike a bargain, which would be too unrealistic or dangerous for the future of Laos, just for the sake of unity.

3. We would not want you to give the impression that we are unduly concerned about United States intentions toward or aid to Laos or that we wish to interfere in their policies. We are aware of the internal political angles which the State Department must consider. We only wish them to know the general outline of Bridle's and our thinking on the problem and our hope that the Western powers won't take any precipitous action until the way ahead looks a little clearer.

4. You might also wish to assure the State Department that we are doing our best to keep the Commission from becoming too involved in the settlement at this stage and that we will continue our efforts to avoid having the Commission endorse terms of settlement which might have unfortunate repercussions on the future of Laos. FRENCH PROPOSALS FOR REDUCTION IN NUMERICAL STRENGTH OF LAOS COMMISSION

We agree with French that, because of Indian chairmanship of the Commission and provision of bulk of administrative personnel, New Delhi would be appropriate place to commence discussion of question of possible reduction in numerical strength of International Commission in Laos. While we do not think, for reasons outlined in our paragraph 4 below, that reduction in essential Commission activities can be contemplated at this time, the French and Indians may find it possible to explore ways of reducing the number of less essential activities and personnel. We also think that it might be useful for the French to consult with the United Kingdom before commencing discussions with the Indians.

2. The French will be aware that we have been interested in reduction of personnel commitments in the three Commissions ever since the basic regroupment and withdrawal of Pour le texte, voir Third Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Laos, 1 July, 1955-16 May, 1957, p. 57.

Despite Canadian efforts, on September 24, 1956, the Commission unanimously adopted an Indian compromise resolution which welcomed (but did not endorse) the agreement reached by the Pathet Lao and the Royal Laotian Government. For the text, see Third Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Laos, 1 July, 1955-16 May, 1957, p. 57.

[86] Le télégramme de Paris Inchin 769 signale que l'hostilité des parlementaires contre les dépenses françaises en Indochine avait forcé le Quai d'Orsay à procéder à un « rigorous, item-by-item examination of basic French interests and responsibilities » dans la région. Par suite de cet examen, les autorités françaises ont décidé de procéder à une « severe reduction in the size and activities » de la mission française de liaison, dont l'effectif comptait 200 personnes et qui soutenait la CISC au Laos.

Paris telegram Inchin 769 reports that Parliamentary hostility to French expenditures in Indochina had forced the Quai d'Orsay to undertake a "rigorous, item-by-item examination of basic French interests and responsibilities" in the region. As a result, French authorities decided to seek a "severe reduction in the size and activities" of the 200-strong French Liaison Mission supporting the ICSC in Laos.

troops took place. We are convinced that the time has long passed since the Commission in Cambodia has served a constructive role and we hope, since the French are now asking for our understanding, they will give us an assurance that they will not oppose elimination of the Cambodian Commission. We consider that the Laos and Vietnam Commissions continue to serve useful purpose although we are keeping under constant review possibilities of reduction of activities and personnel. We are, of course, willing to discuss the question at any time but we cannot see our way clear to promise support for the French until the views of the various interested parties and governments are known and the Commission has had the opportunity to study all the implications involved in such a move.

3. With regard to Laos we consider that among the factors which would tend to make us favour a reduction proposal are:

(a) our desire to reduce our personnel commitments in Indochina

(b) our desire to see the Geneva Agreement for Laos satisfactorily implemented by the parties with the Commission's role kept to a minimum if possible

(c) our understanding of the heavy French financial and personnel problems

(d) our common concern with the French over the heavy costs of operating the Commissions. The common pool fund already owes us close to one million dollars and we have had no assurances to date that early repayment can be expected.

4. The following factors, however, in our opinion weigh against any proposal for a reduction of Commission strength until the way ahead can be charted more accurately.

(a) We think Commission influence tends to support moral claim of RLG to reintegrate Northern provinces and that presence of Commission teams in North has prevented overt Vietminh intervention.

(b) Negotiations on the details of a political and military settlement are still in progress with the outcome by no means certain. If the parties reach a settlement there may be a continuing and perhaps increased short term role for the Commission to play in assisting in and observing its implementation. If settlement is not reached the Commission may need all its resources to try to prevent a troubled situation from getting out of hand.

(c) We agree that teams in Southern Laos are not serving a very useful purpose as far as Commission work is concerned but we think they give an opportunity for our officers to assess extent of Pathet Lao infiltration in the South. The French will be aware, however, that these posts were established by the agreement and are retained as a balance for the teams in the Northern provinces. We have reason to think that the Poles, who are not entirely happy about the continued presence of Commission teams at points such as Houei Thao which are not provided for under Agreement, would accept elimination of Southern team sites only on condition that an equivalent number of Northern sites were also closed. If Southern team sites were abolished we would have to make other arrangements for continuation of our officer rotation scheme. We consider it essential for the health and well being of our personnel that they do not remain too long on the more rigorous and difficult teams in the North and Vientiane is too crowded to provide an alternative to the Luang Prabang, Savannakhet and Pakse sites as a needed light duty centre.

(d) The strength of the headquarters staff of the Canadian delegation has always been kept to a minimum sufficient to handle the quite heavy volume of work. In fact, when members of the staff are absent for health or leave reasons headquarters is often understaffed.

(e) We do not think that Laotians have sufficient experienced staff to replace French Liaison Mission personnel even at the most junior and routine tasks.

(f) We are, in principle, against having the Commissions assume responsibilities for their own logistic support.

(g) We wish to avoid giving the impression at this stage that the Commission considers a settlement has been reached. Reduction in the strength of Commission personnel before the detailed negotiations are completed might lend weight to this point of view.

5. Paris: Please give our views to the Quai d'Orsay and tell them we will welcome further discussions with them on the subject.

6. London and Washington: Please note that French have not informed other governments of their plans although we hope they will consult the United Kingdom. We think, therefore, that you should not raise the question with the Foreign Office or State Department at this stage unless you can see a strong argument for doing so. If the Foreign Office or State Department should raise the question with you please give them our preliminary views as outlined above.

7. New Delhi and Vientiane: We do not think you should raise the question with the Indians at this stage but if they should approach you please express our views along the general lines given above. We will appreciate your comments and suggestions.

8. Hanoi and Phnom Penh: Your views on French proposal will be welcome.

LAOS AND THE FUTURE OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION IN THAT COUNTRY

We are grateful for the attention you have given, following Mr. Alan Dulles' return, to the question of the future of the International Commissions in Indochina. It has been most helpful to have the views of Mr. Dulles, Mr. Robertson and Mr. Young as reported in your telegram No. 1887 of October 22,[88] your personal and confidential letter of October 27† to Mr. Holmes and your telegram under reference, and your own comments on these views. As suggested in your letter of October 27 it might be helpful if we could shortly send you a clear and up-to-date statement of the Department's views on the present position and prospects in the three Indochina states, which you might use in your dealings with the State Department in the days to come. In the meantime we are sending you in this despatch a statement of our views on Laos and on the future of the Commission there, in order to assist you in discussing this matter at the present time when the negotiations regarding a settlement appear to be nearing a decisive stage.

[88] Voir/See Document 665.

2. You might use as a starting point Mr. Robertson's interest in Mr. Bridle's views on the role of the Commission in Laos. Both we and Mr. Bridle, who is here now, very much appreciate the generous terms in which Mr. Robertson expressed this interest. In offering his opinion Mr. Bridle would like to make clear that he considers that any special interest it may possess derives only from the fact that he is in a position to appraise the Commission from the inside.

3. Mr. Bridle agrees with Mr. Alan Dulles' view that the Commission in Laos is discharging an important and useful function. At the same time he feels that during the past few months there has been a shift in its internal balance which is of some significance in the context of current developments and in relations to its future role. The Commission has always been weak in one important respect: its inability, mainly because of Pathet Lao obstruction, to penetrate freely into the northern provinces to check on Vietminh aid in arms and personnel. At the same time, it has done two useful things: it has been instrumental in preventing large-scale fighting, which might have jeopardized the stability of Indochina as a whole; and it has exerted its official influence in the direction of a proper settlement. The shift in its internal balance, which relates mainly to the question of how to effect a settlement, took place after the failure of the Pathet Lao to accept the January 7 resolution.

4. In joining in that resolution, Mr. Bridle suggests, the Indians went a considerable distance toward meeting the Canadian view on the question of a settlement and stretched themselves by supporting the resolution in the face of continuous and vehement Polish opposition culminating in formal abstention. Only once before had the Commission reached a decision through a process other than that favoured by the Indians and for sometime now, in principle, by the Poles — unanimity through compromise; on that occasion also the Indians had split with the Poles. If there is no political settlement now the future pattern of Commission action is likely to be rather different. The Poles (unless, as seems unlikely, recent changes inside Poland cause a softening of their attitude in the Commissions) would probably take as tough a line as they have for the past several months. The Indians, while not supporting the Poles 100%, would never revert to the January position regarding a settlement, and on all major military problems, which would again become active, the Indian view would continue to be considerably closer to that of the Poles than to that of the Canadians. In short, especially in the climate which would exist, the Canadian delegation would find it much more difficult than heretofore to bring about the right sort of Commission action and would probably be forced ineffectually into the minority on many major issues. The Commission's presence would still be of real value; indeed, so long as the Geneva Agreement is to be upheld and so long as the international authority derived from it is to be employed in an effort to keep the peace in Laos, the Commission's presence would be essential. At the same time, its usefulness, especially from the Western point of view, would be reduced.

5. From a statement of Mr. Bridle's views on the role of the Commission as outlined above (in which, incidentally, we concur) you might lead into a friendly discussion of the present position and prospects in Laos. For this purpose you may find our views, as outlined in the following paragraphs, of assistance.

6. We understand and, to a considerable extent, share United States misgivings regarding the type of settlement which is emerging in Laos. It certainly goes well beyond the sort of settlement which we have always envisaged and tried to bring about. Its lip-service to typically Pathet Lao ideals, its spelling out of a neutral foreign policy, its specific allowance of political freedom for Pathet Lao organizations and its provision for a national union government with Pathet Lao participation are all features which are alien to our concept of an appropriate settlement. We are concerned, too, lest the settlement and its implementation fail to bring about truly effective restoration of the northern provinces to RLG control and we would wish a settlement to put an end at least to overt Vietminh interference in Laotian affairs.

7. We appreciate that the apparent desire of the Communists for a settlement in Laos must be related to over-all policy considerations such as a desire to liquidate areas of conflict between East and West and to assume a posture of reasonableness, particularly vis-à-vis the uncommitted nations; a desire to increase the area of Communist China's influence in Southeast Asia; and an interest in adding to the Indochina patchwork another state with neutralist leanings. We also appreciate that the Indians, while not fully sharing these Communist aims, have, as Mr. Young points out, been fostering the development of neutralism in Laos and Cambodia, and that Mr. Sen's efforts to bring the parties together in Laos have played a part in facilitating a settlement of the kind that is now emerging.

8. At this juncture, when the talks in Vientiane seem to be making slow progress and Souvanna Phouma is trying to get Souphanouvong to come down so that outstanding issues may be settled with a minimum of delay, we cannot avoid reflecting that it is possible that the talks will end in failure. While this is a matter over which we have no control, it is a question of direct importance to us because of our continuing responsibilities as a member of the International Commission. We have therefore been giving considerable thought to the alternative situations which would face us depending on whether there is a settlement or not. While this consideration has related mainly to our work on the Commission, it has been impossible to divorce certain more general considerations from our analysis. In discussing with the United States authorities the question of the future of the International Commission in Laos, it would perhaps not be inappropriate to mention some of the considerations both general and relating to the work of the Commission, which seem to us to be of importance at this time. In doing so we recognize, and would wish to emphasize, that the United States has a direct interest and responsibility in Laos of a very different order from that of Canada, and we do not presume to do more than offer an exchange of views on the same friendly basis as we have frequently talked these matters over both in Washington and in Vientiane.

9. If a settlement is reached it may be expected that peace will return to Laos, that the Fighting Units of the Pathet Lao will cease to exist as an independent force and will either return to civilian life or be integrated into the Laotian National Army, that the Pathet Lao will emerge as a political force in Laos proper, and that the northern provinces will again fall under the administration of the Royal Government. At the same time, some further orientation of Laos in the direction of a neutral foreign policy is likely to occur.

10. The extent to which such a settlement would be satisfactory from the RLG point of view, and least objectionable from the Western point of view, would depend partly on the actual terms of the final settlement and partly on the effectiveness of its implementation. It would, for example, be important that the process of regroupment and disposition of Pathet Lao forces take place in an orderly fashion and suitably in step with the process of restoration of the Royal Administration, and that minimum opportunities be given for Pathet Lao soldiers to go "underground", with arms. In this connection we have always seen a certain advantage in a substantial number of such soldiers being integrated with arms into the LNA; the sort of arrangement on this which we understand the RLG has in mind would seem to provide reasonable safeguards against subversion of the LNA by Pathet Lao elements. It would also be important that, since there would evidently be Pathet Lao representation in the government, they at least not be given any essential portfolio. On foreign policy, it would be important that there be no re-orientation going beyond the scope and intent of the policy declarations already made by the Royal Government, and that any further move toward rapprochement with North Vietnam be accompanied by cessation of direct DRVN assistance to the Pathet Lao.

11. A settlement, as finally agreed and worked out, might be less than satisfactory from these or other points of view, and the extent to which the Commission would be expected, or able, to ensure adequate implementation would be limited. Nevertheless, in spite of its willingness hitherto to discuss a settlement first in terms of the questions of importance to the Pathet Lao, the Royal Government seems to be alert to the important considerations involved in ensuring that a settlement meets their minimum requirements, and it may be that, with some quiet advice and encouragement from their friends inside and outside the Commission, they would be able to arrange matters in a reasonably practical fashion.

12. It is no doubt the over-all effect of a settlement rather than any specific aspect which is of primary concern to the United States Government. Before discussing the problem in these terms we will give our analysis of the situation which would exist if the other alternative — failure to reach a settlement — should materialize.

13. There would almost certainly be a renewal of fighting in the north. This would probably be on a small scale, as hitherto, but the possibility of more serious hostilities cannot be ruled out. While we cannot predict Communist military intentions in Laos in the event of a breakdown of the talks, it is not improbable that the Royal Government, even under Souvanna Phouma's leadership, would again incline seriously toward military action on a sufficiently large scale to enable them to dominate and eventually take over the whole of the northern provinces. The United States authorities are probably aware (though the information is being carefully guarded by those who have it) that just such action was being seriously considered while the present talks were in progress and Souvanna Phouma was in France.

14. Souvanna Phouma might feel compelled to resign if he failed to bring about a settlement. It is, of course, possible that he would be prepared to form another government and that he would be called upon to do so. It is equally possible or perhaps more likely, that the choice would fall on another. Whether this would be Mr. Katay or, in the event of his return, Petsarath, or someone else is difficult to say. A contender who could not be ruled out, at least for greater influence and a place in the government, is Bong Souvanouvong. Mr. Katay's chances could presumably depend upon the extent to which he was able to recoup his present relatively low political fortunes by capitalizing on Souvanna Phouma's failure.

15. We recognize that the political situation is likely to be somewhat confused even if there is a settlement, partly because of the unpredictable impact of a return of both Petsarath and Souphanouvong to public life, partly because of the interests and claims of other leaders such as Mr. Katay and Bong Souvanouvong, and partly because, long before the supplementary elections, the present government might have to resign because of the technicality which could be brought into play when the constitutional amendment debarring deputies who are members of the government from voting on the approval of a government comes into force. (The present government was approved by a vote in which such deputies did participate.)

16. At the same time, the likelihood of a political crisis would be greater in the absence of a settlement, and it seems to us that the results of such a crisis would more probably than not be unhappy. There is the slight possibility that a somewhat left-wing government, including Bong Souvanouvong, would emerge; this might lead to an even more radical effort to come to terms with the Pathet Lao. The more probable result would be a government, whether led by Mr. Katay or by Souvanna Phouma, which would adopt a stiff attitude toward the Pathet Lao. Unable to come to terms with them, and perhaps angered with them because of this, they might try taking their case to the United Nations and before long revert to their earlier disposition to settle the issue by force.

17. A further result of a breakdown in the talks, we believe, would be a determined propaganda offensive by the Communists designed to blame failure on so-called "reactionary elements" within the Royal Government and, though this would be manifestly unjustified, on the United States as well. We have clearly detected, in the attitude of the Polish Commissioner, a disposition to regard this as a desirable "second best" if a settlement along present lines cannot be achieved.

18. These probable results of failure to reach a settlement, combined with our appreciation of our position in the Commission in the event of such failure, lead us to view this prospect with some misgiving. We are also inclined to think, though this is not a field in which we are as qualified as the United States authorities, to form a judgment, that, on balance, the consequences of a settlement along present lines, providing the balance of the terms are worked out with reasonable good sense, would be preferable to the consequences of a breakdown. Fighting in Laos would be ended, the country would be reunified, the Laotians would feel that they have been rid of a painful burden which prevents them from freely pursuing their national destiny, and the West in general, the United States in particular, would gain prestige among uncommitted Asian countries for its readiness to promote a peaceful settlement. This could be of considerable importance at a time when Communist China, and the U.S.S.R., are doing their utmost to persuade neutrals, particularly in Asia, that they are prepared to act in accordance with the five[89] principles whereas, in their view, some Western countries are not. Rumours of the apparent readiness of China to settle the Burmese border issue on a reasonable basis is a case in point. All things considered, we are inclined to hope that the critical attitude of the Crown Prince, and what we believe to be a disposition on the part of Mr. Katay to be somewhat skeptical of the possibilities of a settlement, will act within the Royal Government in a manner which will encourage Souvanna Phouma to negotiate sensible terms but which will not carry to the point of contributing to a breakdown.

19. An immediate problem which may cause some difficulty is the question of a union government with Pathet Lao participation. The Royal Government are committed to this in general terms but the Pathet Lao may want to get a more precise commitment in more concrete terms as part of the final settlement. Because of the difficulty of committing any future government too precisely, and since any government would have to be approved by a vote in the Assembly, the Royal Government cannot, and probably should not, go very far to meet any current Pathet Lao demands on this point. On the other hand, the Pathet Lao's desire not to see this aspect of the settlement indefinitely frustrated, and their wish to have some sort of assurance that it will be implemented following the supplementary elections, is understandable. Undesirable though this proposal is from our point of view, the Royal Government would be placed in an invidious position if the negotiations broke down as a result of their failure to make every possible effort to satisfy the Pathet Lao on this provision to which they are committed at least in principle. It would therefore seem desirable that any reasonable formula which Souvanna Phouma and Souphanouvong may be able to arrive at on this point be accepted by the two sides.

20. The long-term results of a settlement along present lines are certainly difficult to predict. As against the internal weakness to which Mr. Young rightly points as a factor making it difficult for countries like Laos to remain really neutral, one might set the genuine nationalistic aspirations of most of her present leaders. Also, the long-term prospects would seem to be the brighter if it proves possible for Laos's friends in the West to give the Royal Government continuing, and perhaps increasingly effective, help in combatting subversion and improving economic conditions. Perhaps the presence of reliable non-communist leaders such as Mr. Katay will have the effect of making it somewhat less likely than we fear that the inclusion of Pathet Lao members in the government will lead Laos toward pro-communist policies.

21. As I have said, these views, though they are in a field which is beyond our official scope as a member of the Commission, arise out of our consideration of the prospects which will face us in the Commission in the event of a settlement or its absence. They are relevant to our own problem in that they bear on this question, which is of considerable importance to our future role in Laos. The most important consideration of course, is the future of Laos itself. On this point the United States authorities are ideally placed to form the best possible judgment, especially since they are now represented, and were previously represented, by such highly qualified Ambassadors as Mr. Parsons and Mr. Yost. The views we have expressed, some of which are necessarily tentative, are intended merely for discussion with the United States authorities and not as views which we would in any way wish to thrust on them.

22. The substance of this despatch has been discussed with Mr. Holmes, who is now in New York, and I am confident it carries his judgment. I leave it to your judgment whether to discuss our views with Mr. Robertson or with some other member of the State Department.

23. The despatch has been marked "Canadian Eyes Only" because some of the earlier correspondence to which it refers has been so marked. Please feel free to discuss anything in this despatch with the United States authorities.

THE PROSPECT OF A POLITICAL SETTLEMENT IN LAOS

When talking to the United States authorities along the lines of our despatch under reference you might also wish to indicate that, like them, we are concerned about the Royal Government's decision, reported in Vientiane's telegram No. 402 of November 3,† to issue joint communiqués seriatim on the points under discussion in the Mixed Political Committee. We had been led to believe that the Royal Government would go no further than to reach private agreement on each item in Committee, leaving formal agreement until all points had been satisfactorily settled. Since, in the interests of a settlement, the Royal Government has agreed to issue communiqués seriatim, it is of some small comfort that Ngon Sannanikone has told our Commissioner that it is understood, by both sides, that agreements reached on particular points are entered into only as part of a complete and final settlement. It is somewhat surprising that this is apparently not being made clear in writing in the communiqués; the Royal Government still seem to place great store on "mutual confidence" as a means of bringing about a settlement.

2. We have been reflecting on the views Mr. Katay has recently been reported as expressing regarding the chances of a settlement being reached and regarding the likelihood of implementation proving difficult. This would seem to emphasize the importance of the Royal Government negotiating sensible and realistic terms with respect to such matters as the effective restorations of the northern provinces to its control, the disposition of Pathet Lao forces, and any Pathet Lao representation in the government. We can understand Souvanna Phouma wishing to go as far as possible to meet the Pathet Lao in order to bring about a settlement. This would also have the effect of making the Pathet Lao more prone to make the settlement work — i.e. to implement it. On the other hand, if the Royal Government does not negotiate terms which are realistic, practical and clear as to their intent, the Pathet Lao might assert a one-sided interpretation while the Royal Government, in the face of such obstruction and because they would feel they were being represented as having agreed to more than they had meant to, might revert to a high-handed attitude which could have unfortunate repercussions. In short, it seems to us that in the remainder of the negotiation the Royal Government should strike a proper balance between their declared aim of sustaining mutual confidence and the need to negotiate constructively and with an eye to the future.

3. While developing the general line in our despatch under reference in conversation with the Americans, you might wish to have these further views in mind. Our reason for mentioning them is not that there is any need to make the Americans aware of them; it is simply that we wish them to understand that we are alert to such considerations.

4. We would also like to emphasize that the material in this letter and in the despatch under reference is intended only as an exposition of our present views on the Laotian situation and the future of the Commission there for your use in conversation with the Americans. You will also note that some of our views, particularly regarding the future of Laos following a settlement, are quite tentative. We naturally wish the Americans to be aware of the difficulties we anticipate, both in the Commission and more generally, in the absence of a settlement and of our general point of view. But we leave it to your judgment as to how far, in the light of known United States views, to go in advancing our opinion on this or any other aspect of the Laotian problem. We would hope that they may see some merit in our views (to the extent that they are at all different from theirs) and we would like the frankest possible exchange of ideas. At the same time we do not want to give the impression that we are what might be regarded as "defeatist" on Laos. Perhaps the best way of striking the right note would be to refer at an early stage to our basic attitude as outlined in paras 6 and 7 of our despatch under reference and to take the general line that, under circumstances as they have developed, the question is essentially one of making the best of an imperfect situation.

LAOS — BRIDLE'S CONVERSATIONS AT THE STATE DEPARTMENT

Bridle was at some disadvantage yesterday when he called on Walter Robertson since our only knowledge of the most recent developments in Laos was a very short AP despatch outlined Saigon, Jan. 1, reporting the creation of a "Government of National Unity".[90] For reasons which we fully appreciate, Vientiane telegrams Nos. 444† and 447† were not received until this morning. The State Department had received reports from Vientiane concerning the announcement of the RLG agreement with the Pathet Lao but we had only the briefest outline of what had occurred from Miss Byrne before Bridle saw Robertson.

2. Robertson was obviously very disturbed about these most recent developments. He said that the "realities of the situation" were "very bad" and that the agreement announced was "much worse" than had been expected even a few weeks ago. He reiterated several times the fact that there was nothing in the Geneva Agreements requiring a coalition government or any of the concessions which have been made by the RLG and that, by "flagrantly disregarding" the terms of the Geneva settlement for a prolonged period, the Pathet Lao had been able to obtain concessions which had not in any way been contemplated at Geneva. Robertson referred to the recently announced agreement as a step towards turning Laos over to the Pathet Lao, the Vietminh, and ultimately to international communism. He insisted that it was necessary to proceed on the premises that the Pathet Lao were not acting in good faith in negotiating the present agreement and would not carry out their part of the agreement in good faith. He said that, if the past were any guide to the future, the present prospect in Laos was dreary indeed. In this connection he referred to the Communist record in Korea and in Vietnam, where the Communists had carried out their obligations only when it suited their purposes and had employed the machinery of international agreements as a facade of legality for advancing their own interests.

[90] Le 28 décembre 1956, le premier ministre du Laos et le leader du Pathet Lao ont annoncé les principes de la formation d'un gouvernement de coalition, et ceux du règlement des questions en suspens. Pour le texte du communiqué, voir Third Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Laos, 1 July, 1955-16 May, 1957, pp. 66-67. L'accord est tombé à l'eau à la fin de mai 1957, quand l'Assemblée nationale du Laos a refusé d'approuver les politiques de Souvanna Phouma à l'égard du Pathet Lao et défait son gouvernement.

On December 28, 1956, the Prime Minister of Laos and the Leader of the Pathet Lao announced the principles for the formation of a coalition government as well as principles for settling outstanding issues. For the text of the communiqué, see Third Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Laos, 1 July, 1955-16 May, 1957, pp. 66-67. The agreement collapsed in late May 1957 when the Laotian National Assembly failed to approve Souvanna Phouma's policies toward the Pathet Lao and defeated his government.

3. In this connection Robertson did not complain specifically about the attitude of the International Commission and repeatedly expressed his appreciation for the good work down by Canada. Significantly, he did not comment with any bitterness on the policies of the Indians or criticize their motives, although he did point out that the consequences of the policies they were pursuing were to facilitate the furtherance of Communist objectives.

4. In replying to Robertson's enquiries as to Bridle's view of the most recent developments and as to the likely attitude of the Commission, Bridle said that we would of course have to obtain more detailed information before a fair assessment could be made. He said that Canadian influence in the Commission had been directed toward getting a settlement without frills. The current agreement apparently involves provisions and concessions which we would regard as neither desirable nor necessary for the carrying out of the Geneva settlement. At the same time, this is the sort of agreement into which Souvanna Phouma has felt it necessary to enter in order to negotiate a political settlement, and our recent efforts have been directed along lines similar to some of the Americans' own interventions, toward persuading the RLG to ensure that the settlement includes detailed and precise commitments by the Pathet Lao with respect to restoration and integration. The present agreement is inadequate in this respect, and the question remains as to whether, in fact, the Pathet Lao forces would be effectively dissolved and whether the Royal authority in the two northern provinces would be effectively restored.

5. Robertson's enquiry included a thinly veiled hope that the Commission might be able to block the settlement on the grounds that it was contrary to Geneva. Bridle considered this impracticable unless there were some provision flagrantly opposed to the intent of Geneva. He thought we would certainly, at the appropriate time, make clear in the Commission our concern that the agreement be fully and faithfully implemented by the Pathet Lao with respect to their forces and the two northern provinces, and he felt we could try to get the Commission to express some such view when the Co-Chairmen are informed of a political settlement. On the future role of the Commission, Bridle took a line similar to the United Kingdom view recently reported from London, stressing that we would be alert to every possible way of influencing the Pathet Lao to honour their obligations, and adding that we would naturally like to be freed of our responsibilities in Laos as soon as we honourably can.

6. In reply to Robertson's query concerning Souvanna Phouma, Bridle said he thought Souvanna Phouma had three main motives which activated him in relation to the Pathet Lao problem: first, he wanted to be the man to solve the problem of the Pathet Lao; secondly, he had a dynastic interest in improving the position of the Souvanna family; and thirdly, while he might privately concede that the provisions of the settlement with the Pathet Lao might not be satisfactory from the point of view of Laos' friends — particularly the United States — he probably believes that he can use his authority to see that the agreement is properly implemented and has in mind, as a last resort, the use of force against the Pathet Lao if it becomes clear that they are not going to honour their obligations. Bridle said that, though the course pursued by Souvanna Phouma so far and his estimate of future possibilities might be fraught with more difficulties than he realizes, he considers him fundamentally more a friend of the West than the United States have been led to believe as a result of recent developments.

7. In reply to Robertson's question as to whether the present "bad" settlement was preferable to no settlement at all, Bridle said that he could only give a personal view and that the question was difficult since both alternatives have unattractive features. He thought that, if one had to choose, the former would be the least unsatisfactory course in the long run, assuming that the RLG made no outrageous commitments on coalition and that the agreement would be fully implemented with respect to the northern provinces and the Pathet Lao forces. In assessing a matter like this, one always came up against the fact that one can only deal through the persons in power in Laos both in respect of a settlement and with respect to countering any ill effects. No settlement at all at this stage would cause much bitterness and would mean a continued division of the country, probably accompanied by a resumption of fighting. While the Vietnamese pattern might in many respects commend itself to Western governments, it was not one which the RLG itself had ever shown any disposition to accept.

8. Rae asked Robertson what the policy of the United States was likely to be in the light of the agreement now reached. Robertson said that the question of continuing United States aid to Laos would probably be decided by the Congressional Committee concerned, and would depend on the extent to which the Communists achieve a position of influence in the Government and the manner in which the fighting units of the Pathet Lao were integrated in the LNA. He said there was a possibility that aid might be discontinued, but he added immediately that this would, of course, be "one sure way of losing the ball game". Bridle said that, in view of the danger of Laos turning to the Communists for economic and financial support, it might be that the situation could only be saved by continuing support from the United States. Robertson fully agreed and clearly had this much in mind. At the same time he added that there were "limits to how long you can go on playing that kind of game."

9. After the interview with Robertson further discussions were held with officers of the Office of Southeast Asian Affairs, which consisted mainly of an exchange of views on more detailed matters. This provided an opportunity for adding some gloss to the talks with Robertson.

10. Kocher, the Deputy Director, asked whether there would be any firm point reached when Souvanna Phouma would refuse further concessions. Bridle said that he was not very hopeful that he would reach such a point except to the extent necessary to carry his Cabinet and the Assembly. Souvanna Phouma's handling of the negotiations reflected his confidence in his ability to carry Souvannavong and in Souvannavong's ability to carry the Pathet Lao. If he found that his confidence in this regard was misplaced, he was quite capable of taking a really tough line with the Pathet Lao.

11. Kocher asked if Bridle thought that Souvanna Phouma would resign should the Assembly refuse to accept the agreement he has signed. Bridle thought he would, but it was difficult to predict what kind of a situation might emerge from this if he did so. There were Katay, and Phoui and Bong (an unattractive combination), but Souvanna Phouma might try to form another government if called upon to do so. In this connection Kocher commented that Souvanna had appeared to have acted on his own initiative in working out an agreement which involved coalition with the Pathet Lao: he had been under no particular pressure to do this from his own cabinet. Bridle agreed but said that pressure from the Pathet Lao was probably one factor.

12. From the discussions generally we gather the impression that the State Department, while very seriously disturbed about the turn of events in Laos, will not recommend any immediate or drastic action with respect to the curtailment of United States aid, though they will go ahead with a reappraisal of their policy in this regard as a result of recent developments. We would gather from the nature of their enquiries that they are considering whether they would make one further approach to Souvanna Phouma (whom Robertson thinks may be headed for Masaryk's fate) or whether they should, through a little quiet work amongst the members of the Assembly endeavour to bring about the rejection of Souvanna Phouma's plan by the assembly and hence the resignation of Souvanna Phouma as Prime Minister. These things were not said at any time, and Bridle did not suggest any course of action to the State Department officials.

13. The conversations were cordial throughout and the main emphasis was on our common problem, for which the United States has the prime responsibility and knows how best to cope with it.

LAOS: THE COMMISSION AND RELATION TO A POLITICAL SETTLEMENT

If the Laotian assembly approves the agreement signed on December 28 by Souvanna Phouma and Souvannavong we may be faced quite quickly with the necessity of taking a position on the future of the Commission in Laos. We have been giving considerable thought to this question and Legal Division has prepared a useful memorandum†, a copy of which is attached, which outlines in some detail the various legal aspects of the problem.

2. You will note that paragraph 2 of the memorandum outlines two possible attitudes we could take towards the settlement and the future of the Commission:

(a) The Commission could consider that the political settlement has been achieved when the documents which the parties assert constitute the settlement are brought to its knowledge, or

(b) Alternatively, the Commission could consider that the settlement has been achieved only when it has been satisfactorily implemented by the two parties.

3. We are inclined to think, and we have noted that you and Mr. Sen are also of this opinion, that it might be dangerous for the Commission to adopt the first of the two policies listed above. As long as there is any danger of hostilities breaking out again in the northern provinces (and this danger cannot be ruled out till the Royal administration has been re-established and the Pathet Lao troops have either been disbanded or integrated) we think the Commission should remain. We are, of course, anxious to complete our job in Laos as soon as possible but we would not want to press for a quick withdrawal at the risk of leaving an explosive situation which the continued presence of the Commission might help to keep in check. The Prime Minister's comments, contained in your telegram No. 435†, to the effect that if the assembly accept his proposals the International Commission will no longer be concerned, and any Pathet Lao who fail to comply with the agreement would be treated as rebels and would be subject to army and police action, would seem to us to indicate that the Royal Government has not ruled out the possibility of using force if necessary to subdue any dissident Pathet Lao groups which might not accept the terms of settlement. While an excuse for action of this kind might be found on legal grounds, we would not like to see it take place because of the possibility of renewed hostilities, which might even involve the Vietminh, breaking out in the north.

4. When discussions concerning the future of the Commission take place, we think you should adopt the line that we would not be adverse to a reduction of the Commission's teams and personnel but that we think the Commission should remain until the restoration and integration have been completed and supplementary elections held. Your suggestion that all teams in the field might be withdrawn and two mobile teams retained in Vientiane seems reasonable provided that adequate helicopter and light aircraft support for these teams would be ensured. You, however, will best be able to judge from the local situation whether you would wish to put forward this proposal. If you think it is practical and practicable we would have no objection to your proposing it.

5. We are inclined to think that the Commission should not pass judgement on any settlement which does not flagrantly violate the terms of the Agreement on the Cessation of Hostilities, as such a function is not directly provided for in the Geneva Agreement. The Legal Division memorandum supports this view and provides arguments which you may find useful should this question come up in the Commission. You will note, however, in paragraph 9 of the memorandum, that the Commission has, to a certain extent, the duty to report to the Geneva powers that agreement on the settlement has been reached and could take this opportunity to pass some sort of judgement on the settlement. We would prefer, however, that any report sent to the Geneva powers on the settlement would confine itself to a factual account of what has taken place and a hope that the settlement can be successfully implemented. The time for the Commission to pass judgement, in our opinion, would be after the successful implementation of the settlement and not at the time the paper settlement is signed or approved by the parties.

6. The Sections in the Legal Division memorandum concerning the future of the International Commission should be of considerable assistance to you when discussing the question in the Commission. You will be receiving, in the same bag, details of our latest approach to the Indians concerning the wind-up of the Cambodian Commission. You may, if you wish, show a copy to Mr. Sen of the memorandum given to Mr. Pillai in Washington which explains our reasons for wishing to dissolve the Commission in Cambodia.[91] We may find that many of these arguments will be applicable in Laos in a few months time and so it can do no harm to let the Indians know in advance that we are against keeping commissions in the field indefinitely when their task is completed. The memorandum of April 6,† referred to in para 17 of Legal Division's memorandum of December 28, is summarized in our telegram YY 62 of April 9† to Cambodia which was repeated to you as YY 84†.

7. We will be grateful if you will continue to keep us informed of developments both concerning the political settlement and the future of the Commission and we will try to give you whatever assistance we can in meeting problems as they arise. Your reports up to now have been most helpful and we have found your views on the situation have been generally along the same lines as those of the Quai d'Orsay and the Foreign Office. We share with them and you the opinion that it would be a mistake on the part of Western governments to react too strongly to the settlement. We do not propose, however, to make further representations to the State Department as Mr. Bridle was able to talk to officials in Washington on January 2 (reference Washington telegram 10 of January 3,† a copy of which has been referred to you) and among other things was able to suggest that in view of the danger of Laos turning to the communists for economic and financial support, the situation could only be saved by continuing support from the United States. The point was apparently well received by the State Department and we think that they are completely aware of the dangers which might result from any withdrawal or partial withdrawal of aid to Laos. The State Department have given assurances that they do not intend to do anything precipitate. We must remember, however, that Congress has reassembled and that the State Department faces internal political problems which do not always confront other governments in the same manner.

[91] Voir/See Document 709.

REDUCTION OF LAOS COMMISSION

The problem is very difficult because there are diverting compulsions. The high financial cost of maintenance the Commission in a role which is largely indirect, potential and deterrent; the complete cutting-off of French financial support and the reluctance of the contributing powers to advance money are factors which build up strong pressure for reduction of the Commission. On the other (hand), in the political and military circumstances now obtaining, after failure to satisfy the December 28 Accord, most of the arguments against reduction set forth in paragraph 4 of your message Y229 October 24 remain valid.

2. I have talked informally with the Prime Minister about his reported pressure to get Souphanouvong to join him in requesting the Co-Chairmen to approve a substantial reduction in the size of the Commission. It seems that he has this in mind, I imagine with the encouragement of the British Ambassador. He is somewhat vague, however, about the practical implications of the suggestion. He is thinking of withdrawal of the southern team but he appeared surprised and disconcerted when I told him that it was almost inconceivable that the Poles would agree to withdrawal of a southern team without a withdrawal also from northern teams which they dislike, such as Houie Thao. The Prime Minister hastily added that he was thinking only of the inactive teams and that he would talk to the Poles. Both the Indian and Polish Commissioners deny that they have heard of any Souvanna Phouma-Souphanouvong conversations about proposing a reduction of the Commission to the Co-Chairmen, which would lead one to judge that the Prime Minister has not repeat not yet spoken to Souphanouvong about it.

3. You may recall that when, in the interests of economy, a secretariat proposal for suspension of the team at Xieng Khouang, Luang Prabang and Muong Peun was recently discussed (reference our letters 74 February 27† and 81 March 6†), the Poles were adamant against withdrawal of any team so long as the Pathet Lao question remained unresolved. This continues to be the attitude of the Polish delegation. It is subject to change, I suppose, only (from?) higher political direction. The Poles doubtless wish continuance of the southern teams both as a restraint upon the Royal Government (theoretically these sites are arms inspection points) and as centres from which they may gather intelligence. The Indian attitude, as stated to me recently by Sen, appears to be one of reluctance to try to persuade the Poles to withdraw certain teams for administrative reasons, so long as the Poles object to such a course on political grounds. It may be, however, that financial pressures will eventually compel the Indians to take a (stronger?) position so that similar consideration will ready the Russians or Chinese to endeavour to get the Polish instructions modified by Warsaw. Perhaps also Souvanna Phouma-Souphanouvong conversations might help to bring this about.

4. When it was generally assumed that there would be ratification of the December 28 Accord, I made the suggestion, in which you concurred, that in the period between ratification of the Accord and the proposed supplementary elections, consideration should be given to withdrawing all the teams and maintaining two mobile teams in Vientiane to carry out any investigations which might be necessary. Even now the southern and central teams probably could be withdrawn without jeopardizing the work of the Commission, since they are inactive and have handled no repeat no investigations within the last year. They would hardly seem to justify the cost of their maintenance. On the other hand, it seems beyond question that one could not repeat not now contemplate withdrawal of the northern teams. Here the military forces of the government and of the Pathet Lao are either in contact or in close proximity, because of the political and military tensions arising from the failure of the December 28 Accord.

5. At present there are certain serious factors which threaten the physical ability of the Commission to maintain the important northern teams. There are:

(1) The complete cessation of French financial support and some slowness of the contributing powers to provide sufficient money to maintain the Commission adequately, which has resulted in a dangerous diminishing of catering, transport and other administrative services for lack of proper payment arrangements.

(2) Apparent inability of the French to maintain in proper service the Commission's helicopters, upon which the sustenance of the teams at Houie Thao and Phong Saly are largely dependent.

(3) A certain indifference to the welfare of the teams which is displayed both by the Royal Government and the Pathet Lao.

With regard to (1), it is essential that an agreement on financing between the Indians and the contributing powers, which results in a sufficient amount of money being promptly and consistently at hand for the maintenance of the Laos Commission, should be swiftly reached. On (2), we are sending you a separate message.† With regard to (3), we are attempting to take remedial steps in consultation with the other two delegations and with representatives of the two parties. Royal Government authorities have already reacted with some apprehension to suggestions from us that the sub-team at Houie Thao will be very difficult to maintain unless all concerned cooperate so that at least the minimum acceptable living conditions for the team are ensured.

6. It is my opinion, with which Brigadier Cooper agrees, that, having regard both to the political and financial considerations mentioned above, the Commission could now withdraw the majority of its teams, maintaining only the essential ones in the North, and still fulfill the functions required by the Geneva Agreement. It would be feasible, I think, for the Commission's tasks in the vital northern areas to be carried out by the teams at Phong Saly and Sam Neua, with the latter operating sub-teams at Houie Thao and at Muong Peun (as now). All other teams in Laos, which have long been inactive, could be withdrawn and they could be reactivated, should specific need arise, by officers based in Vientiane. This would effect considerable saving in costs both of administration and transport. While feasible in our opinion, such a proposal would not seem practicable at the present time because of the attitude of the Poles.

7. It appears that the only reductions which might be made at once are certain administrative ones, the net result of which would not repeat not be of great consequence so far as financial saving is concerned. These are now being studied. I understand that the Indians never received a general policy directive, which is based upon the view expressed by Nehru that every effort should be made to carry out economies in the administration of the Indochina Commissions. To this end and consequent upon discussions which took place at the recent (group corrupt) administrative meeting of the secretaries-general of the three Indochina Commissions in Saigon, we are now examining the possibility of taking such measures:

(1) withdrawing the Indian signals teams from unimportant team sites which have commercial telegraphic communication

(2) reducing the numerical strength of team sites

(3) substituting Laotian sentries for the Indian guard detachment

(4) having the Commission take over from the French Liaison Mission responsibility for catering in Vientiane.

There could not repeat not I think be any appreciable cut in the Canadian headquarters staff in Vientiane so long as the northern teams had to be administered. Sen tells me that the pressure to effect economies is coming from the Co-Chairmen. He said that the Indian Government has told the Co-Chairmen that it will do what it can to achieve savings, but major reductions should not repeat not be expected in the present political circumstances.

REDUCTION OF LAOS COMMISSION[93]

Vientiane: Your comprehensive assessment of the problem of reduction will provide most useful background for discussions which we might have with U.K., French and Indian officials on this subject. We will let you have our comments in a separate telegram.[94] We are hesitant about approaching French as suggested in your telegram INCHIN 40 as it has been our policy to avoid direct involvement in the financial affairs of the Commission. The Indians undertook responsibility for administration and financial matters at the [1954] New Delhi Conference and, unless we would be prepared to share the responsibility with them, we think it should be left with them to work out the details of the problem with the French and the common pool powers. If, however, you think the intolerable situation to which you refer is directly affecting or likely to affect the physical wellbeing of Commission personnel in Vientiane, we would be willing to take up the matter formally with the French. In the meantime we are asking our Embassy in Paris, pending a fuller explanation of the last sentence of your telegram 40, to discuss the problem with officials in the Quai d'Orsay to obtain their version of the difficulties which have apparently arisen between the French and the Indians. We would prefer to have the French version before offering any opinions.

2. We are also reluctant to press the French to have the financial adviser in the French Embassy in Vientiane act as the French Treasury's agent for handling money paid to the French Liaison Mission by the International Commission because of fears expressed by the Vietnam delegation in January. At that time Fournier of the French Embassy in Saigon indicated to Baudouin that the French Embassy there was trying to arrange for the two million piastre monthly advance from Commission funds to be made payable to the Embassy, rather than a French Treasury official so that embassy officials could transfer the funds immediately to the South Vietnamese. Fournier expressed some fear that if the French Treasury official received these funds the Treasury might consider the money as a return for excessive French contributions in the past and keep it as partial repayment for the money which the common pool owes to the French. Would you please let us know if there would be any danger of a similar situation arising in Laos if Commission funds were paid to an agent of the French Treasury.

3. Paris: Would you please discuss informally with appropriate Quai d'Orsay officials the problem raised in Campbell's telegram 40 which was repeated to you. At this stage we would prefer not to give any opinion to the French but you might say that we have been made aware of the problem and would appreciate their views.

4. We would be grateful if you would also outline to the French, without leaving them a copy of the telegram, Campbell's assessment of the possibility of reduction of the Laos Commission as outlined in his telegram INCHIN 38. LAOS — U.K., U.S.A. AND FRENCH NOTES[95]

While we agree that, from our point of view as a member of the Commission, publication of notes was unfortunate at this time, we are not convinced that it would be appropriate for Commission to make any comment on them.

2. The Royal Government of Laos is the only sovereign and recognized government of the country and the Pathet Lao have no status other than that of "armed forces" which have been in opposition to the government. The former's status is recognized by the Geneva Agreement and declarations; by the United Nations; and by many countries of various political persuasions including the U.S.S.R. It would appear to us, therefore, that if the Royal Government chooses to send Notes requesting views of other sovereign governments with whom it has diplomatic relations, the Commission would be going well beyond its terms of reference in questioning the Royal Government's right to do so or in questioning the propriety of the three Western Governments sending replies expressing their views.

3. The introduction of a condemnatory resolution by the Poles may well be an attempt to swing the propaganda resulting from the publication of the Notes to the advantage of the Communist side in order to try to counteract whatever effect this might have had on the Laotian political scene. It would seem to us, therefore, that we should direct our efforts towards delaying a decision on what type of comment, if any, the Commission might make. The propaganda advantages to the Communists which might accrue from a Commission statement will lessen as time goes on.

4. Keeping this in mind it would seem tactically wise, both in the Commission and in your private talks with Sen, not to exclude entirely the possibility of reaching some compromise resolution. We would not want you, of course, to agree to discuss in the Commission the Polish draft resolution although, to play for time, you might not refuse to discuss Sen's draft as a working possibility. We find nothing to argue about in his points one and three. We would not like, however, to be associated with an expression of opinion, such as that given in his point two, that which would appear to portion the blame equally to each side. You might tell Sen this and also say that we could not agree to any condemnation of either the Royal Government or the Western Powers for reasons given in paragraph 2 above.

5. While we would prefer the Commission not to take any action we realize the difficulties you would have in persuading Sen to this and have therefore suggested the delaying tactics. When these have been exhausted you might, in the interests of creating a further delay, suggest that you would like to refer the question back to us before taking a final position. This would also give you an opportunity to let us have your views on what our next move might be.

6. Should your colleagues insist on immediate action you might remind Sen that the January 7 Resolution was essentially a compromise resolution and that full Canadian views on where the responsibility lay for failure of the negotiations were contained in our draft resolutions leading up to the January 7 Resolution. It could be unfortunate if, in his determination to have the Commission make some kind of reply to the Western notes, he should force us into a position where we might have to consider issuing a minority statement giving our full views. We would be reluctant to expose publicly these differences of opinion within the Commission because of the effect this might have on the negotiations and on the future usefulness of the Commission. We would therefore hope that he would not insist on inclusion of his point 2, with which we could not agree, thereby pushing us into contemplation of measures that we would otherwise not undertake. You will be in the best position on the spot to decide if it should become necessary to take this more extreme line. We would prefer to adopt the delaying tactics outlined in paragraphs 4 and 5 above but you should feel free to adopt a stronger line if the occasion appears to call for it.

7. We are repeating to you the text of the Laotian Note of February 22, requesting the views of the three Western Powers, which has been given to us in confidence by the State Department. We do not appear to have any record of the Laotian Note of January 16, 1956[96] referred to in paragraph 4 of the Laotian Note. We are inclined to think, from the context that it may refer to a note of January 6, 1957 but we also have no record of any note on that date. We are asking our Embassy in Washington to seek clarification on this point from the State Department.

8. Paragraph 5 of the Laotian Note indicates that the Royal Government were anxious to know the views of the three Governments because of reported differences of opinion among them which were leading to a feeling of uncertainty in Laos. The Foreign Office have apparently accepted this as the purpose behind the Laotian request. We are wondering if there might not be more behind the Laotian Note than this and that Souvanna Phouma might have hoped that the United States, possibly through consultation with the French and British, would indicate if not support for, at least a less critical attitude generally towards the December 28, 1956 Agreement, and specifically towards the coalition idea. Souvanna Phouma may have been hoping to get some acknowledgment from the Western powers that his efforts towards achieving a settlement were not unappreciated. If this was behind the Prime Minister's thinking then the Notes would appear to have contributed little, one way or the other, to this end. On the other hand, the U.S.I.S. statement, of which we have seen only abbreviated press reports, commenting unfavourably on such items as coalition which the British and French insisted should not be mentioned in the Notes, may have brought forth a result which was quite contrary to that intended or hoped for by Souvanna Phouma.

9. Much of this is, of course, speculation on our part, but we think it would be useful to know how the Western Notes have been received by Souvanna Phouma and other leading Laotian political figures. It would also be helpful if you could let us have their reactions to the publicity which surrounded the publication of the Notes, including the U.S.I.S. story. We would be interested to learn too if the Laotian Government is aware that your colleagues are planning to have the Commission comment on the exchange of Notes and if so what its reactions might be. If they have knowledge of the proposed resolutions we would be grateful if you would keep us informed of any expressions of opinion they might make on them.

10. London and Paris: Please give our outline, our views and plans as indicated in paragraphs 2 to 6 to Foreign Office and Quai d'Orsay. We would also like you to let us have any comments they might make.

11. Washington: We would be grateful if you would keep the State Department informed along the same lines as indicated in our paragraph 10. Would you also seek clarification of the reference to the January 6, 1956 Note as indicated in our paragraph 7 and ask for a text.

12. New Delhi: Would you please take an early opportunity to speak to an appropriate official of the Indian External Affairs Ministry giving our general views as outlined in paragraphs 2 and 6 in the last two sentences of paragraph 4. You might also say that we agree that making the Notes public was not helpful but that we do not think it would improve the situation to have the Commission comment on them. Interference by the Commission would, in our opinion, only serve to attract increased attention to the Notes which would result in a prolongation of the propaganda efforts by both sides. As the Laotian Assembly is due to meet again in June and the negotiations have been stalled rather than completely called off we think it would be wiser to let the subject die as quickly as possible. You might also wish to tell the Indians informally that our advice was not sought by any of the governments concerned during the exchange of Notes and that if it had we would not have considered it appropriate for us to offer comments. We are inclined to think, however, that it would have been difficult for the Western Powers to have declined to reply to the Royal Government's request for their views. Under the circumstances we consider the Notes were quite restrained and in themselves should not cause too much alarm to the Pathet Lao. It is rather in the comments and interpretations by both sides that the danger lies and by keeping silent the Commission might help to reduce this danger.

LAOS — U.K., U.S.A., FRENCH NOTES

Your telegram No. 57 was not received until after we had despatched our telegram No. Y-191 in which we said we preferred no repeat no resolution. We are still inclined to that position and hope that our High Commissioner's office in New Delhi may have some success in persuading the Indians to the point of view expressed in paragraph 12 of our Y-191.

2. Should the Indians and Poles press forward with a resolution which in any way condemns or makes mention of the three Western Notes we will have to consider recourse to making our own views known. There are two precedents which might be followed in doing this:

(a) Forwarding of the resolution to the Co-Chairmen with a covering letter which would contain our minority views. This would follow the procedure adopted when the Commission forwarded its January 7 Resolution to the Co-Chairmen on February 15, 1956.[97] The forwarding letter gave the Polish minority view on the resolution and also the comments of the Indian and Canadian delegations.

(b) In the case of the Nong Khang Resolution (see paragraphs 53 to 65 and Appendices C and G of the Second Interim Report of the Laos Commission),[98] the Polish delegation sent its own views, to the effect that the voting on the resolution was invalid, direct to the parties. No mention of this Polish action was actually included in the body of the Interim Report but was alluded to in Appendix G which gives the letter from the High Command of the Pathet Lao, dated June 11, 1955 rejecting the Nong Khang Resolution. As we argued at the time that the Polish action in sending views contrary to the majority decision direct to the parties was in contravention of usual procedures and was not provided for in the Cease-Fire Agreement, we would not wish to make use of this precedent until all other means open to us had been explored and rejected. Nevertheless we should keep in mind that this precedent also exists.

3. While we think at this stage it would be best not to mention what methods we might take to ensure that our minority views, if necessary, are made public, we still think that, if pressed, you might wish to consider giving Sen an outline of our views as contained in paragraphs 6 and 12 of our telegram No. Y-191. You might also wish to mention that we were somewhat surprised, in view of their attitude at the time the January 7 Resolution was passed, that the Poles are now referring to it in their draft resolution.

4. We have examined your draft resolution contained in your telegram No. 57 and our first impression is that it appears too long (see paragraph 7 below). We are giving thought to the possibility that, if unanimous support could be obtained for a short resolution which would reiterate and bring forward the January 7 Resolution without any direct or indirect reference to the Western Notes, it might be acceptable as a possible alternative solution although we still think that having no resolution would be better. We would like to have your further views on this before we take any final decisions.

5. If it should be decided that we might reluctantly accept this alternative we would think that any draft resolution submitted should not refer in any way to "various statements" as this would seem to lay it open to the possibility of interpretation as being critical of the Western Notes. We have in mind a brief resolution which would recall the considerations contained in paragraph 7 of the January 7 Resolution; would note that some further progress had been made in reaching some measure of agreement in principle but that understanding on detailed application of the principles is still pending; would note that while a cease-fire was agreed upon in principle there have been reports of some recent outbreaks between the forces of the two parties; would reiterate the recommendations contained in points 1 and 2 of sub-paragraph 5 of paragraph 7 of the January 7 Resolution and ask the parties to continue their efforts to seek a solution.

6. We do not know what chance there would be in persuading the Indians and Poles to accept a resolution along these lines. In the case of the Poles it would mean that they would now acknowledge the validity of the January 7 Resolution which they had previously opposed. If the Indians could be induced to see the validity of the arguments outlined in paragraph 12 of our Y-191 they might look on a resolution of this kind as a compromise which they could accept without the loss of face which a complete reversal of their position would involve.

7. We have stressed the point of having any possible resolution kept short because we are afraid that one that is too long might be more easily twisted by amendment. We would also like to be careful to avoid any suggestion that a settlement at any cost is to be desired. We think that any resolution which we might consider should also avoid giving the appearance of whole-hearted approval of the December agreement.

8. Before deciding whether to disassociate ourselves from any resolution or to attempt to achieve the alternative outlined in the preceding paragraphs. We must have a good look at the possible effects either decision might have on the Laotian situation, on the future work of the Commission, and on our relations with other interested friendly Western powers. We note from your telegram No. 59† that Royal Government reaction to the Notes appears to be generally favourable. This, in part at least, answers the points raised in paragraphs 8 and 9 of our Y-191, but we would still like your comments on them. We can be reasonably certain that our UK, USA and French friends would be disappointed and probably annoyed if we voted for any resolution at this time, whether mention of the Notes is made in it or not. On the other hand, by disassociating ourselves from any Commission action we will almost certainly incur the displeasure and possibly the distrust of the Indians.

9. This telegram is for internal consultation only and not for discussion with other governments at this stage. We have just received your telegram No. 56† outlining Sen's draft resolution and will be letting you have our comments on it in a following telegram.

LAOS — UK, US, FRENCH NOTES

The Indian draft compromise resolution submitted by Sen on May 6 is a marked improvement over his original draft outlined in your telegram No. 56. While we continue to prefer to have no resolution we do not have much hope of achieving this desirable outcome. New Delhi's telegram No. 197 of May 9,† however, encourages us to think that it might be possible to persuade the Indians to agree to a resolution which might be acceptable to us. We think therefore that it may be wise for you to consider Sen's draft as a basis for discussion. Before doing so, however, you might wish to introduce your own draft resolution along the lines suggested in our Y-206. This would have the advantage of placing our views on the record and might serve as a counter-balance to the extreme Polish draft resolution. Having our resolution in front of the Commission might make it easier to reach a compromise which would satisfy Sen and still avoid the appearance of condemning the Royal Government and the Western powers and specifically approving the December 24 agreements.

2. Miss Byrne of the Laos desk of the State Department has given her personal opinion to a member of our embassy staff in Washington that a relatively innocuous Commission resolution would be less harmful than a stronger resolution accompanied by a minority expression of Canadian views. She said she hoped the Commission would not produce a resolution which could be as successfully exploited by the Communists as the January 7 Resolution had been by the Western Governments. While the three Western Powers would, of course, prefer the Commission not to take any action concerning the exchange of Notes we think they would understand our position, and Miss Byrne's attitude encourages us in this, if we found it necessary to give support to a relatively mild resolution in order to keep the Indians from going along with the Poles on a much stronger one.

3. We are still inclined to think that, in addition to general support, Souvanna Phouma would have liked some endorsement of the December Agreement including the coalition plan. It is quite clear however that the US and UK are not happy with the December Agreement as a basis for a political settlement and that they are particularly opposed to the proposal for a coalition government. The UK has indicated that it would be more appropriate for the Royal Government to consider a coalition after complete restoration of the administration of the Northern provinces to the royal Government has been achieved. The French, like ourselves, have taken a more non-committal attitude towards coalition.

4. While in keeping with Canadian experience (e.g. Czechoslovakia in 1948) we entertained serious doubts about the wisdom of forming a coalition government including Communist representatives. We did recognize the special circumstances in Laos and the fact that such a solution was not incompatible with the Geneva Agreements and might work out, provided repeat provided agreements on restoration of the administration in the North contained sufficient safeguards, and provided the non-communist elements in the Government and Assembly remained alert to the risks involved. In any case, we felt this was a decision which was up to the RLG to make after receiving advice from various quarters it might wish to approach. It is evident that the possibility of reaching a final settlement is still foundering on the question of the detailed agreements. It is for consideration how long efforts should be continued to reach agreement on the basis of the December declaration or whether a new start should be made as is evidently favoured by the US and UK. This obviously involves delicate questions concerning the domestic political situation in Laos in which we think the Commission should not be involved. For this reason we would like to avoid having the Commission make any statements which would go any further than it has before in expressing specific approval of the December Agreement.

5. In the following paragraph we are outlining what we think is the extent we would be prepared to go in support of Sen's resolution. Our suggested amendments to the latest Indian draft resolution have been designed to attempt to avoid

(a) specific approval of the December Agreements

(b) reference to or criticism of the exchange of Notes

(c) endorsement or approval of any of the Agreements in terms which would go further than the Commission's existing resolutions and letters commenting on the Agreements

(d) approval by the Commission of an executive agreement, requiring legislative approval, before it has been finally approved by the National Assembly.

6. Following is the text of a suggested amended version of Sen's resolution which we think we might be able to support:

(i) "Notes that the parties have not arrived at a final political settlement as envisaged in the Geneva Settlement; declares its conviction that a political settlement should be achieved as a result of full and free discussions between the parties and that in these negotiations the Commission has adhered to the policy that the parties should discuss freely between them what is most acceptable;

(ii) "Recalls that it noted with satisfaction the common declarations of August 10 and 15 [sic] by its resolution of September 24, 1956 and that subsequently it addressed letters to the Co-Chairmen drawing their attention to the various agreements signed between the parties on October 31, 1956, November 2, 1956, December 24, 1956 and the common declaration of December 28, 1956 and that in its last letter of January 11, 195[7] to the Co-Chairmen the Commission concluded by expressing the hope that these measures which the parties affirm as representing a great step forward towards the final solution of the Laotian problem in conformity with the Geneva Agreements would soon lead to a final settlement of the Laotian problem.[99]

[99] Pour les textes des accords et de la déclaration commune, voir Third Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Laos, 1 July, 1955-16 May, 1957. Aucune version imprimée de la lettre du 11 janvier n'a pu être trouvée.

For the text of the agreements and the common declaration, see Third Interim Report of the International Commission for Supervision and Control in Laos, 1 July, 1955-16 May, 1957. No printed version of the letter of January 11 could be found.

(iii) "Notes that the agreements so far signed and the terms of negotiations, so far as they are known to the Commission, do not go against the Geneva Agreement and the Resolutions adopted by the Commission, including that of January 7, 1956.

(iv) "The Commission considers that to achieve a final political settlement the parties

(a) should continue their efforts to reach agreement on all outstanding points of difference;

(b) should scrupulously observe the cease-fire and not take hostile actions or give provocations and should maintain complete peace and

(c) should utilize the machinery of the Joint Political and Military Committees established by consent between them to the maximum extent possible."

7. You will note that our text revises paragraph one of Sen's draft to omit reference to the "various documents" and to "pressure or intervention".

8. Our amendments to paragraph 2 have been made in an attempt to avoid saying that the Commission gave "its general approval" to the various agreements signed between the parties. We think Sen's draft goes too far in giving this impression. In the Commission Resolution of September 24, 1956 concerning the August Joint Declarations the Commission "takes note with satisfaction" of the outcome of the discussions and "expresses its satisfaction" at the extent of agreement achieved by the parties. The Commission also "hopes that a final solution will be achieved". Nowhere in the resolution does the Commission welcome the common declarations of August 5 and 10. The closest it comes to commenting on the Declarations is in paragraph 2 of the resolutions where it states the Declarations "form a suitable basis for final agreement in respect of all outstanding matters in conformity with the Geneva Agreement". The covering letter to the Co-Chairmen forwarding this September 24 Resolution avoids commenting on the August Declarations.

9. Again in the Commission's letter of December 3 transmitting the Agreements of October 31 and November 2, 1956 by the Joint Military and Political Committees of the two parties, the Commission avoids giving its approval or endorsement of the Agreements and merely states that the "present documents mark progress which the Commission notes with satisfaction". In its letter of January 11 to the Co-Chairmen attaching the Joint Declaration signed by the two Princes on December 28 the Commission, at our insistence, confined itself to facts and did not indicate judgment on the agreement which was concluded. The Commission merely expressed the hope that "these measures" would soon lead to a settlement of the Laotian problem.

10. You will have noted that we have no particular quarrel with paragraph 3 of the Indian draft.

11. Our amendments to paragraph 4 are designed to avoid having the Commission recommend "that it is essential that the agreements so far signed should be implemented wherever possible." We have also omitted the word "neutral" because, while the Royal Government has undertaken not to enter military alliances or allow military bases to be established on Laotian soil we do not think they have necessarily committed themselves to a strictly "neutral" policy in all their foreign affairs. We would not consider it proper for the Commission to interfere in the conduct of the Royal Government's relations with other countries provided these are kept within the provisions of the Cease-Fire Agreement and the declarations made at Geneva. You will recall that we have taken this position before when the Poles have attempted to have the Commission make reference to Laotian neutrality. A recent example of this was in the resolution introduced by the Poles at the 210 Commission meeting on August 14, 1956. The final agreed resolution of September 24 omitted any reference to neutrality.

We appreciate the successful efforts you have made to resist the passage of a majority resolution containing the objectionable features of the original Polish and Indian drafts. We agree that there could be disadvantages in our taking a minority position but we should not let this possibility rush us into supporting a draft which

(a) is susceptible of being twisted to criticize the Western Notes,

(b) carries us farther than Commission has already gone in endorsing executive agreements not yet approved by the Assembly and which may not be the only way of achieving a settlement of the Pathet Lao problem, or

(c) which may be used to influence the course of domestic political debate in Laos.

2. Delhi telegram 197 May 9† suggests that Desai's instructions to Sen are that there should be no direct or implied criticism of the Western Notes. Any Sen threat to revert to a more critical resolution is likely to be made for bargaining purposes and to contain considerable bluff.

3. We understand that National Assembly is to meet May 11 and that Prime Minister will report on negotiations with Pathet Lao and request vote of confidence possibly before May 18. If this is so it may be desirable to ascertain tenor of Assembly and avoid specific endorsement of December 28 Declaration as this may be calculated to influence debate and vote.

4. Factors to be taken into account in considering any resolution and indication of sort of compromise resolution we would find acceptable are given in our Y-216 May 10. Following are comments on draft prospective resolution in your telegram 67 May 9.

5. Preamble appears to us to still contain phrases such as reference to "various documents and statements" which seem to refer to Western Notes. Similarly word "difficulties" is susceptible to different interpretations and should either be dropped or Commissioners should be asked to put their interpretation on Commission records so that more malicious interpretation could not be given later. We prefer shorter form in our draft and use of adjective "final" to qualify political settlement since we consider partial settlement already achieved in 1955 national elections.

6. In second paragraph we consider word "essential" too strong. Word "mutually" gives Pathet Lao too much equality when we believe they should be under Commission and world opinion pressure to accept "equitable" terms. Phrase "without external influences and pressures" should either be deleted or Commissioners should be asked to place their interpretations on Commission record.

7. In third paragraph word "welcomed" is too sweeping. You should insist on factual statement along lines paragraph 6 (ii) of our Y-216 for reasons stated in our paragraphs 8 and 9. We do not like use of adjective "unanimous" qualifying resolutions or letters as this undermines whole basis on which Commission takes majority decisions such as January 7 Resolution.

8. Paragraphs 4 and 5 go too far in endorsing executive agreements not yet endorsed by Assembly. Phrasing should be broader to imply that these agreements "are not contrary to Geneva Agreements" or "can serve the objectives".

9. We have no objections to paragraphs 6 to 9.

10. We would like to see some reference in resolution to 7 January 1956 Resolution.

11. We are pleased with progress you have made but consider that you should take risk of further delay to try to obtain further modifications proposed and in order not to influence Assembly debate.

12. If after further discussion you are satisfied that

(a) our principal points have been met by amendment or placing balanced interpretations on the record

(b) resolution will not interfere with Assembly debate and

(c) you cannot secure further delay to consult us again, you are authorized to vote for suitably innocuous compromise resolution.

Memorandum from Head, Far Eastern Division, to Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

LAOS

Attached for your signature is a reservation-free congratulatory message† which you may wish to send to Peter Campbell.

We in the Far Eastern Division enjoy a canter through rough country such as we have been through on this resolution. We like to feel that we are holding a tight rein on some of our high spirited horses. The need to do so can be readily seen from comparing Peter's own first draft with the final compromise resolution adopted which is even an improvement on it. You will recall that in his tel. 69 of May 9† Peter said he had wrung great concessions from Sen by making bluntly the kind of threats contained in our Y-191. He went on to say that he did not think we could press further and feared that Sen would need little provocation to revert to his earlier tougher position. Peter strongly recommended that we accept that draft — probably in the confidence that this plea would touch your soft heart. But we hard-hearted fellows in Far Eastern were unmoved. So we pressured you — against your better (?) judgment — into signing two further telegrams urging Peter to fight on. We were encouraged by Teakles' report of Desai's views which enabled us to gauge the amount of bluff in Sen's bargaining.

I am pleased that in the resolution finally adopted Peter got 9 out of 9 of the specific amendments I got you to approve in the telegram I submitted last Saturday morning. In retrospect this seems to me to have been a successfully conducted operation. Our tough instructions enabled Peter to take an even tougher line than he would have felt justified in taking on his own. In the end this produced as good results as we could expect out of a bad starting position.[100]

LAOS — NEW KATAY GOVERNMENT

We have been informed by the UK High Commissioner's office here that Katay agreed on June 3 to form a new government on as wide a basis as possible.

2. He has promised four places in the government to supporters of Phoui who have accepted. They have also agreed on the following program:

(a) Negotiations should be resumed with Pathet Lao on basis of December 28 Declaration.

(b) Pathet Lao must be dissolved, their armed forces reintegrated, and Royal administration restored in two Northern provinces.

(c) Then they will take two Pathet Lao into Government.

(d) Government will resign if agreement has not been reached within two months.

3. According to the UK Ambassador in Vientiane the biggest obstacle to the formation of this government is the attitude of the United States Government. On the one hand, the Assembly unanimously approved the December 28 Declaration, including the admission of Pathet Lao. On the other hand the United States Government is understood to be opposed to this under any circumstances. As we have not had a general review of the Laotian political scene with officials of the State Department for some time we think you might take an opportunity to discuss the latest developments with them on a very informal basis. We do not know at what level you think your discussions should take place but would be inclined to think they might be more profitable with someone higher than at the desk level. We would be interested in their assessment of the possibility of Katay successfully forming a government with Phoui's support. It would also be of interest for us to know what alternatives to a Katay-Phoui Government they might have in mind if they do not think they can agree to the program which Katay proposes to adopt. It would be interesting to know under what conditions the United States has indicated it might have to reconsider its aid program for Laos. We would also find it helpful if State Department officials could give us some idea of their current thinking on the terms of a settlement which they might find acceptable and which would not require a reassessment of their aid program.

4. In your informal discussions we think you might make the following points:

(a) Because of our role as a member of the International Commission and because, although we have recognized Laos, we have no diplomatic relations with the Royal Government, we have tried not to interfere in local Laotian politics. We have, however, when our views have been sought by members of the Royal Government, expressed our concern at the lack of safeguards in the settlements to date and have warned of the pitfalls into which a free government might fall in dealing with communists.

(b) Our main task in Laos, as a member of the International Commission, has been and is to supervise and control the provisions of the Cease-Fire Agreement. Although we have thought that important safeguards have been wanting in the agreements which the Royal Government have concluded up to now, we have not actually found anything in these which is contrary to the terms of Cease-Fire Agreement. We have, nevertheless, managed to keep the International Commission from giving unqualified endorsement to the December Agreements on the grounds that the Commission should not interfere in the internal affairs of the Kingdom unless policies are pursued by the parties which are contrary to the terms of the Geneva Settlement.

(c) Our Commissioner in Laos, and officers now serving in the Department who have been in close contact with Laotian Affairs, are of the opinion that the Katay program is probably the best the Western powers can hope for, given the present emotional attachment of the majority of Laotians to unity and the increased nationalism which is being displayed by even the more moderate and pro-western Laotian politicians. We think that, in not promising any Cabinet posts to the Pathet Lao until after restoration and integration are completed, Katay has been about as realistic as could be hoped for and we do not think that any government proposing less would have much chance of success. We would hope therefore that the United States would consider carefully the alternatives to a Katay-Phoui Government before they decide to cut off or drastically reduce their aid.

(d) The alternatives to a Katay Government as we see them are;

(i) A government of nonentities committed to a program of stalemate which would satisfy few if any of the Laotian leaders and would probably tend, in the long run, to increase the emotional appeal of unity and nationalism and might finally result in a rejection by the Laotians of advice or aid from the West. This could in turn open up a broad path for communist infiltration into the rest of Laos and all of Southeast Asia.

(ii) A new government by Souvanna Phouma, presumably not including the moderating influence of Katay and his group, committed to the December Agreements and immediate acceptance of Pathet Lao members into the government without the conditions included in the Katay program.

(iii) Immediate formation of a much more nationalistic, neutralist and pro-Pathet Lao Government, perhaps headed by Bong or Pethsarath or a combination of both, which would be more inclined to accept communist terms in order to achieve a unified country. Withdrawal or reduction of aid under these circumstances would, we fear, only tend to throw the Laotians more completely into the lap of the communists.

5. We can see the dangers in admitting communists to membership in the Royal Government and we can also appreciate the difficulties which the State Department might face with Congress in continuing aid to a government which included communist members. Nevertheless we think these known difficulties should in the long run be viewed with less concern than the possibility that, by obstructing the desire for reunification of their country which we think is almost unanimously held by Laotians, we might eventually tend to drive them from the pro-Western into a strictly neutralist or even anti-Western position.

6. We are asking you to give these views to the appropriate State Department officials on a very informal basis and we would be grateful if, at the same time, they would let us have their assessment of the situation and their comments on our appreciation of it. For your own information we understand that the UK Embassy may be giving similar views to the State Department but we would not wish the Americans to think our approach was linked with theirs or that we were doing more than having a friendly exchange of views on the subject.

7. Vientiane: We realize that slow communication facilities have probably held up your reports on the current political situation but have thought it advisable not to wait for your views, which we think will be substantially in accord with ours, before discussing the situation with the State Department. Your comments on the points we have made will be appreciated.

8. London and Paris: If you are discussing this subject with officials of the Foreign Office or Quai d'Orsay you might indicate that we are asking our Embassy in Washington to discuss the situation with the State Department. You might stress the informality of our approach and say that our main purpose in this is to obtain an indication of the latest American thinking on the political future of Laos and also to give them our views on the possible dangers involved in rejecting Katay's more moderate program for a political settlement.

STRATEGIC CONTROLS AND THE "CHINA DIFFERENTIAL"

No reply has yet been delivered to the U.S. Note of January 7, 1957,[102] proposing a general tightening of the strategic controls and in particular of the controls applying to trade with Communist China. This is because we did not consider that this proposal should be supported, but on the other hand regarded it as undesirable to join the other governments participating in the control arrangements in formally opposing U.S. views. We had some hope that the Note represented a final statement of U.S. preferences preparatory to abandonment of the completely uncompromising position which the U.S. had heretofore displayed, and that it might be possible before long to reply in a manner which would serve to contribute constructively to the removal of anomalies in the control system on an agreed and workable basis. In the meantime all other participating governments have replied, more or less outspokenly from case to case but all negatively, to the similar U.S. Notes addressed to them.

2. Fortunately the U.K.-U.S. discussions at Bermuda led to, or provided the occasion for a shift in the U.S. attitude. This shift has been made public in press conferences by Secretary Weeks[103] and, a few days later, by President Eisenhower.[104] Agreement has now been reached that the general question of China controls will be discussed in CHINCOM (the standing committee supervising the arrangements for control of trade with China) early in May, and the U.S. authorities have this week sought our comments on certain specific proposals which they intend to put forward at that time.[105]

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures à l'ambassadeur des États-Unis

Note from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Ambassador of United States

NOTE NO. 90 Ottawa, April 29, 1957

CONFIDENTIAL

The Secretary of State for External Affairs presents his compliments to the Ambassador of the United States of America and has the honour to refer to the Ambassador's Notes No. 161 of January 7, 1957 and No. 179 of January 18, 1957† concerning strategic controls. The first proposed an early meeting of the "Consultative Group" to discuss the possible tightening of the strategic controls, and the second in response to the request in Note No. 14 of January 16† from the Department of External Affairs enlarged on the reasons why the United States Government favoured such a tightening. In the period since these Notes were delivered circumstances and ideas have altered somewhat, and it might therefore be useful to set out first the Canadian Government's impressions of the present situation relating to strategic controls.

The Canadian Government continues fully to support the objectives of the general system of controls, and to regard that system as broadly satisfactory for the achievement of those purposes. It has therefore been concerned at the distortions which in recent months have been introduced into the operation of the system, in particular through the increasingly liberal use by a number of participating governments of the exceptions procedures applicable to trade with Communist China. These procedures have been applied more extensively than might reasonably have been expected, to a point where the integrity and effectiveness of the entire control system may have been threatened. Hence the Canadian Government agrees that means should be sought of preventing further injury, through undue use of exceptions procedures in connection with trade with Communist China, to the general system of strategic controls.

The Canadian Government recognizes, however, that the effective operation of the control system requires the full cooperation of participating governments. The Committees are, of course, unable to enforce compliance on participating governments which may be unwilling of themselves to enforce restraints on trade. When cooperation fails, the effects are bound to undermine each participating country's ability to abide by its own strategic control undertakings.

In giving careful consideration to the matters raised in the Ambassador's Notes the Canadian Government has therefore taken account of the views of other governments participating in the system of strategic controls. It is apparent that a number of governments have found it difficult or impossible to reconcile with their legitimate national interests the full content of the restrictions, currently in force, upon trade with Communist China. In the absence of agreement to reduce these restrictions significantly, they have chosen to subject the agreed procedures to some distortion so as to permit a greater volume of trade with China than a literal application of agreed procedures would have permitted. It appears that these distortions have arisen not as a result of any general dissatisfaction with the agreed procedures in themselves but as the only means available, short of open disavowal of the control system, of permitting the trade they feel should be allowed. Nevertheless the abuses and distortions which have occurred have weakened not only the restraints on trade with China but the effectiveness of the control system as a whole.

In seeking a solution of the China list problem it is important to re-establish unity of policy and uniformity of practice in the work of the Committees. In this situation it might be considered that two courses are open. The first would be to make no significant change in the existing classifications but to seek other means of retaining dissatisfied governments within the voluntary control system. It appears probable that this could be achieved only at the cost of further major erosion or distortion of existing procedures with respect to the system as a whole, including the application of these procedures to the European Soviet bloc where the arrangements have in general functioned with satisfaction to all participating governments. The second course, clearly preferred by the great majority of participating governments, would be by agreement to reduce significantly the restrictions on trade with Communist China to a level approximating that applicable to trade with the European Soviet bloc.

It is the view of the Canadian Government that the first course is not a sound and realistic solution, and that it should not be considered. It could only be temporary in nature, and damaging to the general control system. There remains, then, the course of reducing significantly the present special restrictions on trade with Communist China and confining such trade within defined procedures and licensing guides mutually accepted and agreed by all participating governments. From the close and effective collaboration in these matters between United States and Canadian authorities the former are no doubt aware of the Canadian attitude towards this possibility. Canada has been concerned to avoid encouraging abuses, and also of course to preserve the close collaboration so much valued by the Canadian Government and to avoid an apparent isolation of the United States. Canadian representatives have therefore refrained from expressing formally in the Committees views differing from those which have been expressed there by U.S. representatives. In substance it is the Canadian view that it is difficult to demonstrate the strategic justification for prohibiting the shipment to Communist China of the majority of the items in the "China differential list", and that the criteria on which that list rests imply a policy approximating economic warfare rather than one of controlling strategic commodities. Canadian authorities hold the view that that differential list might be abolished or at least substantially reduced without significant prejudice to the security of the free world. Both in terms of consistency within the control structure, and of obtaining full support for the effective operation of the control system, it would now appear desirable that the elimination or substantial reduction of the China differential list should be agreed.

The Canadian Government welcomes the recent indications in statements by President Eisenhower and others that the United States Government is now prepared to agree to a reduction of the China differential list. It is the belief of the Canadian Government that, in the interest of preserving an effective system of strategic controls actively supported by participating governments, the multilateral discussions soon to take place should be directed towards a real and workable understanding on the question of trade with Communist China. The Canadian Government is confident that when such an understanding is achieved it will become possible through negotiation to settle such other lesser problems as may remain in the application of the strategic control system. In particular, it should then be possible to reach agreement to limit the use of exceptions procedures to cases where they are genuinely and properly applicable, thus restoring the healthy operation of the procedural arrangements in general.

In the light of the foregoing, it may be stated that the Canadian Government considers that action should be taken promptly along the lines already indicated with a view to bringing about an effective limitation of the use of the CHINCOM exceptions procedures. The Canadian Government does not wish to comment at the present time on the proposal that there should be a sharp curtailment of shipments of copper wire to the European Soviet bloc, a question which it is understood is being discussed with others more directly concerned. Finally, with regard to the suggested significant increase in the possibility of aggression or intensified subversive action by the Communist bloc in the Far East, the Canadian Government does not consider that there is sufficient evidence of this to require any general tightening of COCOM/CHINCOM controls. Such a tightening might, for reasons already indicated, tend to diminish the effective application of existing controls, and moreover might tend to increase international tension and hence itself increase the risk of war. In the light of these considerations the Canadian Government would not regard it as desirable to impose a general curtailment of shipments of all items under International List II quota control. The Canadian Government will, however, remain ready at any time to discuss possible curtailment of shipments of individual commodities which may be regarded as constituting a risk to the security of the free world.

SECRET [Ottawa], May 13, 1957

STRATEGIC CONTROLS AND THE CHINA DIFFERENTIAL

On April 29 you signed a note to the United States Government setting out the Canadian Government's general position on this question and in particular expressing the view "that the elimination or substantial reduction of the China differential list should be agreed".

In accordance with the policy position set out in that note we instructed the Embassy in Washington on May 2 to deliver to the State Department a communication giving our comments on specific U.S. proposals for dealing with the China differential problem. The substance of these comments was that the proposals "... do not appear to correspond to the requirements of the situation ... Canadian representatives will be unable to support those proposals in their present form in the forthcoming multilateral discussions. It is hoped that the United States Government will be able to consider modifications which would permit a generally acceptable compromise". In further instructing our representatives in Washington and Paris we have explained our view that if agreement is to be reached the United States will have to make substantially greater concessions than it has so far indicated any willingness to do. On the other hand some concessions will undoubtedly be required of the other governments concerned who at present propose the elimination of all the differential China controls and the application to China merely of the controls now in effect for the European Soviet bloc.

It has been apparent for some time that there would be great difficulty in achieving an acceptable compromise on this question. We have hoped, however, that it might prove possible to agree upon an arrangement whereby the China differential list of controlled items would be eliminated and the same lists of items subjected to control for China and for the European Soviet bloc. In order to provide the element of differential treatment for China which we believe to be a political imperative for the United States, one would apply these lists to China under somewhat more restrictive procedures than for the European Soviet bloc. It might be possible to formulate procedures involving a sufficient appearance of differential treatment for China to meet the essential requirements of the United States, without in practice imposing restrictions on China trade so extensive as to be unacceptable to the European governments. We have had in mind that if a deadlock appeared imminent a compromise proposal by Canada along these lines might have reasonable prospects of success, quite possibly greater prospects than if it were to be put forward by any other of the participants.

This general approach to the negotiations on Canada's part is in accord with the assessment put forward by Mr. Robertson in his telegram No. 960 of May 7† (attached). In that telegram Mr. Robertson pointed out, however, that domestic pressure on the United Kingdom government was so great that it could afford only minor concessions to the United States point of view.

London's telegram No. 994 of May 10† (also attached) indicates that the situation has just about come to a head. It appears that the United Kingdom government now sees little or no hope of an agreed solution, and during the course of this next week will have to take a difficult decision whether "to go it alone or to propose or accept a compromise short of, but only just short of, abolition" of differential treatment for China. Canada House estimates that a compromise proposal from Canada might be helpful, but only if it came very close to meeting the United Kingdom position in full. If it did not do this, Canada House sees no way in which the United Kingdom government could avoid turning it down, however reluctantly.

It therefore appears that we must decide and probably today or at the latest tomorrow, between letting events take their course and making a last effort to obtain a compromise. We have already been told that the United Kingdom Foreign Office very much appreciated the "helpful intervention" which our delegate made in the discussions this past week, an intervention of which we have not received a report at the time this is written but which on the basis of the instructions sent to Paris should have indicated unwillingness to accept the United States position without at the same time indicating explicit support of the United Kingdom position at least in its extreme form. The prospect of a successful compromise resulting from a Canadian intervention is not very good. If a major public split is going to develop in any case it might well be the wiser course to rest on our present position and avoid taking a more explicit public position which would lead to our being directly involved in the debate. We would not I think be open to any significant criticism if we were to let events take their course. The United Kingdom-United States split would be unpleasant, and would no doubt revive some of the antagonisms which characterized the Suez dispute. Nevertheless the long term results of such an event, caused in this case very clearly by undue rigidity on the United States part, might not all be undesirable; there might appear in Washington in time a somewhat more flexible attitude towards the principal allies of the United States.

If we decide on the other hand to intervene, we would have to determine the precise impact to be attempted. If we regard the United Kingdom position as the extreme left and the U.S.A. position as the extreme right, our compromise proposal could be aimed at dead centre, at left of centre, or at right of centre. It would appear from the reports from London that anything not well left of centre would be unlikely even to get fair consideration by the United Kingdom. Anything not right of centre might well be rejected by the U.S.A. also, although we have no knowledge of U.S.A. reactions to last week's developments and the U.S. administration may conceivably be now prepared to consider a major concession in the hope of salvaging some form of agreement. A position well left of centre is in accord with our own assessment of the merits of the case, and we could move even closer to the United Kingdom without doing undue violence to the views of our technical experts. It should be recalled once again, however, that to declare such a position would be likely to draw us into a major public dispute with the United States if the negotiations break down in spite of our efforts, a dispute from which we could disengage ourselves by refraining now from further intervention. I do not know whether the Government would consider the chance of obtaining a successful compromise sufficiently important to risk such a dispute with the United States at the present time.

We must by tonight give our delegate in Paris some instructions, if only of an interim nature. On the one hand we could tell him that the Government has decided not to introduce compromise proposals in view of the limited prospects of acceptance and the considerable disadvantages which would result from failure. On the other hand we could tell him that we are working out a compromise proposal which we will send him within the next 24 hours and ask him to make a statement to this effect in the Committee with a view to holding off the breakdown of negotiations at least until he is able to make a statement the following day. If we follow the latter course we will then have to determine how close our proposals should come to the position identified with the United Kingdom and supported by the other participating governments. Choices on this point may be summarized as follows:

(a) Something which the United Kingdom can fairly confidently be expected to accept, but which is likely to have little chance of success in Washington.

(b) Something closer to the U.S. position; even a small shift in this direction would probably lose U.K. support without necessarily being acceptable to the U.S.

(c) Something which the United States should be able to accept but which very probably would not prevent the United Kingdom from breaking off the negotiations.

I find it very difficult to formulate a recommendation as between the two principal alternatives, namely to let matters take their course or to attempt a compromise. On the whole, however, in view of the complexity of the matter and the fact that there is no fundamental Canadian interest involved apart from a possible further deterioration in the relationship between London and Washington, I don't think we should stick our neck out.

If, however, you think that we should introduce a compromise, then I would recommend that it follow the line indicated in (a) above, namely that it should take a form which the United Kingdom can accept, unless their position has gone beyond all reason, even if this means a serious argument with Washington.

I should be grateful for your comments and instructions.

I attach (Paris telegram 379†) a report of the discussions of May 10 including the text of the "helpful intervention" made by our representative and referred to above.[106]

REVIEW OF CHINA CONTROLS

Following for Wilgress, Begins: The interventions made in last week's discussions in the Committee by our representative were excellent, fully reflecting our ideas here and as far as we can judge from this distance skilfully adapted to the atmosphere of the negotiations. We note with satisfaction that you have been following these developments, and assume that you are in close contact with Neal concerning them.

2. I have now had an opportunity to review the situation in some detail for the Minister, and to seek his views on the desirability of taking a specific initiative in the Committee designed to lead to a compromise agreement. In the light of the U.K. position particularly as reported in London's telegrams 960 of May 7 and 994 of May 10 it appears that such an intervention would at present have only limited prospects of achieving a useful result. In these circumstances the Minister does not think that we should formally seek or put forward a compromise, at least until the UK and the USA seem to be a little closer together. We should, however, watch the situation closely and seize in the discussions in the Committee on any opportunity which promised success for any move on our part. This means, in effect, that the matter may largely have to be played by ear in Paris, and the Minister hopes that you will continue to be available to our representative to assist him in determining his course.

3. In the light of these new developments we have been reconsidering the possible content of a Canadian proposal should it be decided to make one. It is our present thought that such a proposal should be close enough to the UK position for us to be fairly confident that it could be accepted by the UK Government, even at the risk of being pretty unpalatable to the United States. This might be achieved by a formula which, in rough outline, would involve the abolition of the China Special List (with the possible transfer of a few items from it to International List III) and the application of the International Lists to China as well as to the European Soviet bloc. International List I, the Munition List and the Atomic Energy List would be embargoed for China. List II would apply to China as well as the European Soviet bloc subject to some suitable agreement concerning the determination of quotas which would govern shipments to China; pending such an agreement, List II items would in effect be embargoed for China. As far as List III is concerned items would be free for shipment subject to reporting, but in view of the special concern felt by some participating governments regarding the export of such items to China we would envisage that CHINCOM might remain in existence with the specific task interalia of reviewing, at specified intervals, shipments of List III items to China to determine in the light of experience whether any of these items required more stringent control such as quota limitation or embargo.

The rough outline of a possible proposal given above is intended at present only for the information of yourself, Neal and our other representatives concerned. We would be grateful for any comments, and would hope in any case that if a Canadian intervention in the Committee should become appropriate there would be opportunity for a further check with us. You will of course appreciate the extent to which our thinking on the desirability, timing and content of a possible Canadian intervention is conditioned by broad considerations extending beyond the specific field of strategic controls.

REVIEW OF CHINA CONTROLS

Following from Wilgress: I have been in conference with Neal and this telegram should be regarded as coming from us both.

2. The situation as we see it is that the UK are indifferent to the consequences of a breakdown of the negotiations. They feel that right is on their side and that they have the majority of the Committee behind them. Moreover, it is possible that as a result of the stir created by their giving in to Nasser on the Suez Canal, the UK Government would not be adverse to displaying a strong attitude in opposition to the USA on the question of China controls. Another factor intimately connected with the Suez question is that they would not wish to provide the French another example of their backing away from a previously strong position. We should bear in mind that it was the French who introduced the proposal which has been the basis of the discussion in CHICOM.

3. We are still of the view that it is too early yet for us to intervene with a compromise proposal. We have considered the possible content of a Canadian proposal as set forth in paragraph 3 of your telegram E742 of May 14. One difficulty we see is that this would not be regarded as a compromise proposal but rather as another variant of the UK-French position and hence unacceptable to the USA. When the time is suitable for us to intervene, the proposal which we put forward should be one which is likely to lead to serious consideration with a reasonable prospect of agreement being reached in a short space of time. We shall be in a better position to advise the part we could usefully play after the meeting on May 17 when the USA will put forward their revised proposal and invite comments.

4. The important thing at the moment is to keep the situation fluid. You will have noted from Paris Embassy telegram 388 May 13† that the USA will make an effort to avoid either being put in the light of delaying the discussion or taking an unconciliatory attitude. We, therefore, feel it is most important that the UK at tomorrow's meeting should not take a position which will make further discussion impossible. In our view it would be desirable for them to put forward some counter proposal. This should show an inclination of readiness for further discussion and not exclude the possibility of a compromise, which in effect would mean the retention of some China differential. We have, therefore, concluded that it would be useful if the Acting High Commissioner in London could talk at a suitably high level to the UK Government in this sense, indicating that we would be prepared to support any constructive attitude which they may be able to adopt at tomorrow's meeting.

REVIEW OF CHINA CONTROLS

We agree with the assessment that the U.K. Government is aware of the considerable possibility of a breakdown of the negotiations and is not unduly alarmed by that prospect. We believe that they must be quite aware, particularly in the light of experiences of recent months, of at least the immediate consequences of such a breakdown. We believe that the political pressures upon them are such that they are unlikely to be significantly influenced by Canadian suggestions as to the course that they should follow. We have accordingly concluded that Wilgress's suggestion that you should urge a broad course of action upon them is unlikely to be sympathetically received or to have much effect.

2. On the other hand, in accordance with the Minister's views as indicated in our telegram E-742 of May 14, we believe that some effort to exercise a major influence might now be appropriate. Unless you see reasons for not doing so, you should now seek an interview at a suitably high level in which you would express the concern of the Canadian Government at the lack of favourable developments in the Paris negotiations of last week. You should emphasize our sympathy with the U.K. position, but indicate that we see little prospect of agreement unless they can find it possible to make some concession towards the position held by the United States. While we are not urging them to make such a concession, we would be most interested to learn whether their position would admit of any such concession. You should then use your own judgment as to how far to press for a specific statement of what concession, if any, it might be possible for the U.K. to accept. If it should appear that there is some real concession that could be made, and if the conversation is progressing favourably, you should enquire whether it would be of assistance for a suggestion involving this concession to be made by Canada or for that matter any other country or whether on the other hand the U.K. is preparing some further statement to deliver on its own account.

3. We would hope from such an interview to get a clearer picture than we now have of the degree of freedom which the U.K. Government may be able to exercise and hence of the prospect that there may still be of a compromise agreement being reached. We would not wish at this stage to seek to persuade the U.K. to follow a particular course so much as to learn precisely what courses there are open to them.

4. You should find an opportunity to explain incidentally that suggestions which have been put forward by Canadian representatives in Paris have been intended to explore the possibilities of compromise rather than to represent the position of the Canadian Government or any specific Canadian proposals. We have in mind here that the conversations recorded in Paris Embassy telegram 402 of May 15† may have led the U.K. Government to conclude that we have decided we are not prepared to support a position acceptable to them, a conclusion which may finally prove true, but which we would not wish to leave in their minds at this time.

REVIEW OF CHINA CONTROLS

I have just seen Wright, Assistant Under-Secretary at Foreign Office. I told him that, as they knew, we regarded UK position on elimination of China differential as closely in accord with our own views. Nevertheless, we were concerned at prospect of breakdown of current discussions in Paris and wondered how much room for manoeuvre, if any, there was in UK position. I made it clear that we were not urging UK to come forward with compromise proposal, if their minds were closed to compromise. If on the other hand, there was some form of compromise they were prepared to consider but which they would not wish to put forward on their own initiative, it might be possible for us to help.

2. In reply Wright left me in no doubt that UK position was rigid and that there was little disposition here to contemplate any form of concession. He told me that revised American proposals had been turned down at today's meeting in Paris and that Heads of Delegations were due to meet on May 21 to decide whether any useful purpose would be served by resuming discussions. He said UK continue to believe that elimination of China differential is only sound course of action and that, in these circumstances, they can see no reason for coming forward with compromise proposal that fell short of their objective.

3. Wright did not however leave me with impression that UK are indifferent to consequences of final parting of ways with Americans over this issue. This will certainly be one of the considerations which Ministers will have in mind when they decide on next step between now and Tuesday. My own feeling is that some form of face saving formula might still have a chance of being accepted by UK provided it meets their position in substance and is sufficiently simple to satisfy public opinion here that there has been a real easing of China controls. I think that formula along the lines set out in paragraph 3 of your telegram E742 meets these criteria and you might wish to consider putting it formally to UK Government. Obviously however the matter of timing is now crucial.

REVIEW OF THE CHINA CONTROLS

The USA this morning presented their revised proposal merely with the statement that they hope that it would prove acceptable to the other governments. The UK replied in terms outlined in London's [1084]. They did not offer any suggestion of their own but said that they would still be prepared to consider any extensive improvement of the USA proposition. France and Japan followed the UK lead. Germany and Netherlands regretted that the USA proposition had proved unacceptable but expressed the hope that agreement would eventually be reached. Belgium said that if any differential were to remain it would have to be merely symbolic.

2. Now that the decisive stage has been reached, we have permitted ourselves to explore the views of other delegations in private conversations. If the UK continue to maintain a complete uncompromising position they will probably be supported by France and Japan. They are not assured of the full support of some of the other delegations. In the event of a breakdown, it is possible that Germany and the Netherlands and possibly Belgium, Italy and Norway will in some way disassociate themselves from the extreme position of the UK, Japan and France.

3. We do not see a likely prospect that the USA can now bring forward a further proposition without some prior assurance that it will be seriously considered. Assuming that the results of this discussion will not long be secret from Members of Congress they will face the dilemma that they will have to admit almost complete surrender of their principles or acknowledge that the other Members have reached the decision in disregard of USA expressed convictions. If they have to choose between these two evils it is possible they will choose the latter.

4. Insofar as the UK is concerned, we think they have reached the point of abandoning hope of an agreed solution which they could accept. We believe that they are now turning their minds to finding the means to give effect to a disagreement with the least amount of recrimination.

5. None of the other delegations except Germany and ourselves seem to have given constructive thought to the possibility of devising a compromise formula. The Germans have a formula almost identical with our thinking. Neal will confer with Mr. Wilgress tomorrow to consider if we can suggest any Canadian initiative that would have a prospect of success together with the timing and method of presentation.

6. They will consider the proposition which has occurred both to us and to the German delegation and which may indeed be put forward by that delegation although they have not been authorized to do so yet. We understand that Mr. Adenauer may have had some discussion of this subject in Washington. Our latest proposition which like the others we put forward is intended only for exploration involves the complete elimination of the differential subject to the following:

(a) For List II items prior consultation on an adhoc basis for the time being with quantitative limits to be agreed in November;

(b) Special reporting for certain List III items which may be considered of particular importance;

(c) For the time being, 29 other items on List III will be subject to prior consultation procedure pending a review of their possible strategic importance by the China Committee. These 29 items are all items which were downgraded to List III from List I or List II in the 1954 review in the face of USA objection. We can send you the list if you wish it.

7. The UK would probably accept (a) and (b). This has been represented to us, however, on a personal basis as the absolute maximum they could accept. We feel equally certain that the USA would not go that far and we feel that the addition of point (c) would constitute a reasonable concession to ask from the UK. We think it possible they might take it under pressure.

8. The proposition outlined in the paragraph above will form part of the general discussion with Mr. Wilgress tomorrow. We have thought it wise, since Monday is a holiday in Ottawa, however, to put it forth in a preliminary way in case you wish to guide our further exploration of possible courses of action.

9. With respect to paragraph 4 of your E768, we think the UK delegation here is well aware that our suggestions of possible solutions have been exploratory and indicate the importance we attach to reaching an agreed solution rather than any tendency to support a position which they could not accept.

10. We envisage also the possibility that you would regard as somewhat more objectionable a breakdown in the negotiations after the Canadian intervention than if there had been no such intervention. We gather that the UK would welcome a proposal by us which would involve only points (a) and (b) set forth in paragraph 6. But we think they want this only for tactical reasons to smoke out the absolute minimum to which the USA would agree. We have the impression that the UK would be prepared to go somewhat further than (a) and (b) and disincline at this stage to lend ourselves to a purely tactical manoeuvre of another delegation. We also realize that it would be awkward for the UK if we came forward with a proposition they felt unable to accept but which was accepted by the USA.

11. In view of urgency of matter we have put forward these preliminary views in advance of our consultation with Mr. Wilgress but you may expect more on Saturday.

REVIEW OF CHINA CONTROLS

I returned on Saturday noon from a visit to the First Canadian Air Division and studied the messages on this subject that had been exchanged on Friday. After consulting with Neal I decided to wait until today before letting you have my considered views.

2. In paragraph 6 of Paris Embassy telegram under reference, Neal has set forth two possible courses of action. The first would be for Canada to put forward points (a) and (b). The second would be to put forward these two points along with point (c) as the possible basis for a compromise.

3. The first of these two alternatives resembles the formula set out in paragraph 3 of your telegram E742 but is expressed in a form technically more intelligible to the members of the Committee. The UK probably would welcome Canada putting forward this proposal as it would serve to test out the absolute minimum to which the USA would agree. It also represents the maximum which the UK feel at present they can accept.

4. The second of the two alternatives is much more in the nature of a compromise. It represents a position between the two extremes and is therefore a formula the USA might be induced to accept. The UK would not like it because it involves a prolonged review by the Committee of controversial items. This is something to which they have objected from the outset of the present discussions.

5. On the question of timing the first alternative is one which we would have to put forward in the next day or so, whereas the second alternative could be deferred until it becomes absolutely certain that an impasse has been reached.

6. Obviously, if we adopt the first alternative we would have fulfilled our role of honest broker. We would then have to leave it to some other delegation to add later point (c) to points (a) and (b). It is not certain whether the German or any other delegation would be prepared to do this.

7. Since it is desirable that when we do intervene in the Committee with a formal proposal it is one that is likely to lead to a resolution of the deadlock, I would suggest that first of all Neal should discuss privately with the USA delegation points (a) and (b) with a view to ascertaining their reactions. Neal could then tell the UK delegation what he had learned from the Americans and indicate that this is leading us to consider putting forward a more far-reaching proposal with a view to arriving at a compromise. London could explain the situation to the UK Government and indicate the nature of the compromise proposal we intended to put forward. In our view this would be the second alternative referred to above, since we do not consider that any of the other suggestions so far put forward are likely to achieve the objective we are aiming at.

REVIEW OF CHINA CONTROLS

In the light of Neal's excellent analysis in Paris Embassy telegram 415 we agree both in content and in tactics with the suggestions put forward by Wilgress in his telegram 821.

As we see it, Neal will now try out his first formula (points (a) and (b) of paragraph 6 of his telegram 415) on the USA. If it is accepted, it should then be easy to persuade the UK and others to agree also. If USA reaction cannot be obtained at once, the UK delegation should perhaps be warned that we are discussing a possible compromise suggestion with the USA. If this first proposal is unacceptable to the USA, as on the whole seems probable, it remains to consider the second formula — i.e. points (a), (b) and (c) of paragraph 6 of Paris tel 415. Before this is introduced in the Committee there should be discussion with the UK; if the UK reaction is such that it seems worth while to go ahead, it would probably be desirable to seek the support of others such as Germany who appear hesitant about supporting an uncompromising stand against the USA. At the same time Canada House could be outlining the situation, and the nature of our contemplated proposal, to UK authorities in London. It may be useful for London and Paris to maintain contact by phone.

The precise timing and tactics of presenting a proposal in the Committee will no doubt be affected to some extent by the outcome of bilateral talks such as those suggested, and in any event will have to be determined in Paris in the light of the situation as it develops. In all of this you will no doubt have in mind the Minister's comment, reported in one of our earlier telegrams, to the effect that we should not take a formal initiative if it would have but little chance of leading to agreement between the UK and the USA, but that we should be alert to seize any opportunity which holds reasonable prospects of achieving that result.

Since the paragraphs above were written we have received London's telegram 1107† reporting UK-USA negotiations in London. Obviously Canada should not act in any way which might embarrass these two governments in the Committee or impede their reaching agreement bilaterally. While we see no occasion to alter our earlier comments, this new development underlines the fact that the decision whether, when and how to proceed with a Canadian proposal must be taken in Paris in the light of the latest info available at the time.

REVIEW OF THE CHINA CONTROLS

The negotiations in Paris have reached a critical stage where something must give. The U.S.A. has been insistent on preserving "a substantial differential", although they have gradually made concessions of some significance. The U.K., on the other hand, has steadily refused to move from its original insistence on complete or virtually complete abolition of the China differential.

On Tuesday of this week we were informed in London (Telegram 1115 of May 21†) that U.K. Ministers had decided to reject the latest U.S.A. proposals and had concluded that there was in the circumstances no scope for compromise. The same day (Telegram No. 1113†) the Foreign Office spoke to Canada House in terms apparently designed to discourage us from proposing a compromise.

On Monday we had authorized Wilgress (Telegram E-780) to exercise his own discretion as to whether, when and how to proceed with a Canadian compromise proposal, bearing in mind your earlier comment to the effect that we should not take a formal initiative if it would have but little chance of leading to agreement between the U.K. and U.S.A., but that we should be alert to seize any opportunity which held reasonable prospects of achieving that result.

In the Committee on Tuesday (Paris Telegram No. 427†) "the majority of the Committee were concerned about the consequences of a breakdown now that one seemed imminent" and a good offices group consisting of Belgium, Canada, Italy and the Netherlands was established to attempt a compromise. They learned that their original proposal was "totally unacceptable" to the U.K., and prepared a modified proposal. The chairman by an "intentional error" tabled both proposals in the Committee, and the U.K. promptly declared one, the U.S. the other to be unacceptable.

The following day Canada House was told (Telegram No. 1129†) that the Foreign Office fully appreciated our reasons for undertaking a last-minute mediatory effort but that both compromise proposals were unacceptable. It was expected in London that, "unless a miracle occurred", the U.K. would inform the Committee meeting on Thursday that they were "proceeding with alignment of China and Soviet bloc controls in accordance with original wishes of majority of Committee". Earnscliffe called on instructions on Wednesday evening to give us a statement in almost identical terms. We reported this démarche to Paris (Telegram No. E-793†), indicating that we had "expressed regret that apparently it had not been possible for an acceptable compromise to be worked out. Our latest information from Paris had indicated a widespread interest in seeking a compromise and that the efforts to this end, which according to last report were still being made, might in fact be successful". We advised our delegate that, if a U.K. statement along the lines indicated were made, he should express regret at the breakdown of the negotiations but avoid appearing to blame any one government.

On Thursday morning Paris reported (Telegram No. 433†) that the U.S.A. at the meeting that day would announce "unqualified support" of the more favourable (to the U.S.A.) of the two compromise proposals, and would be supported fully by Belgium, the Netherlands, Turkey, Italy and Germany and supported partially by Japan.

We have not yet received our delegate's report of the Thursday meeting.[107] Late Thursday afternoon, however, the senior U.S. Counsellor (in the absence of the Ambassador and Minister) called on urgent instructions to make earnest representations. He said that the U.S.A.-supported compromise proposal had been put to a vote, with eight voting in favour, five against and Canada abstaining. (This leaves one of the fifteen members unaccounted for.) He said that the U.K. had undertaken to submit a new paper, probably by Monday of next week, and that the Committee would meet next Wednesday to vote again. (Formal voting is a novel procedure; it is not clear whether voting for a particular proposal implies a commitment to apply the provisions of that proposal even if it is not unanimously accepted. The report of a new U.K. paper and another meeting next Wednesday is surprising in view of the U.K.'s declared intention, barring a "miracle", of breaking off the discussions this week.).

The U.S. Government, the Counsellor stated, was urgently pressing those concerned to review their positions and consider whether they could not at next week's meeting switch to support of the U.S.-supported compromise formula. He assumed that this was in the hope that if all or most of the support still remaining to the U.K. could be drawn off, the latter faced with the prospect of isolation might give way.

We replied that we would consider these representations and inform the U.S.A. of the Government's position.

It appears to us that the U.S.-supported compromise, reportedly supported by an 8-5 vote, is not freely acceptable to the group as a whole. While the U.S.A. may be able to force its acceptance without formal dissent, it is unlikely to provide a satisfactory basis for the future application of China controls or to avoid continued dispute on this question between the U.S.A. and the U.K. It is most questionable, moreover, whether even the threat of isolation will intimidate the U.K. If they continue to reject this formula we would be in a most ambiguous position if we have in the meantime agreed to support it. Our general position has been to refuse our support for any proposal not acceptable to the two main opponents, and we do not consider that the latest U.S.A. representations give cause to abandon that position. To support the proposal, moreover, might imply an obligation to apply its terms (which are not on their intrinsic merits in accord with the Canadian position) even if it is not unanimously accepted.

For these various reasons, I consider that the abstention reportedly recorded by our delegate on Thursday was the action according most closely with our general position, and in the absence of some major new development will be equally appropriate next week. I recommend that, unless some important new development arises, we should let it be known prior to next week's meeting that we will not support any proposal which is not acceptable to the group as a whole. I also recommend that we now inform the U.S. Embassy of this position.[108]

STRATEGIC CONTROLS ON TRADE WITH CHINA

In a separate memorandum† we have proposed a line which might be followed in dealing with press enquiries concerning the expected news of the U.K. decision to eliminate the "China differential" from its export control procedures.[109] That line may appear to differ in emphasis from the view implied in the Minister's comment on the attached telegram.†

2. That comment of course applied to instructions to our representative in the Committee, who would be speaking in closed session. We had a variety of reasons for taking an impartial position there, of which perhaps the main one was to preserve our "honest broker" status as long as there was any possibility of continued negotiation.

3. It is our view that public comments by Canadian spokesmen on the breakdown should continue to be impartial. When the negotiations opened our own position was admittedly close to that of the U.K., and we had little sympathy with the U.S. proposals. During the negotiations the U.S. has made a series of concessions, however, which in our view did not go far enough but nevertheless did represent a real effort to reach agreement. The U.K. on the other hand has consistently refused to make any concession of substance. It would not be true to say that all the blame for the breakdown is on the U.S.A., although there is no doubt that continued U.S. intransigence over a two year period did much to make the U.K. stubborn when the U.S. finally consented to negotiate.

4. There is before us, moreover, the difficult and delicate problem of what policies and procedures Canada should follow in future now that there is no longer a generally agreed China differential. On the one hand there is not much commercial pressure on us domestically to abandon the differential, and the U.S. authorities will undoubtedly press us hard to retain it. On the other hand we have never regarded the differential, or at least the great bulk of it, as justified on objective strategic grounds. It is a question deserving careful thought exactly what course we should follow, and we would not wish any early public

WITHDRAWAL OF COMMONWEALTH FORCES FROM KOREA

There has been outstanding for some time a United Kingdom proposal that the Commonwealth contingent in Korea should be withdrawn, and that a joint approach of old Commonwealth members should be made to the United States Government on the matter.

2. The New Zealand Government replied to the United Kingdom proposal on February 5 indicating that it would wish to have an informal indication of the United States Government's reaction to the suggested withdrawal before a final decision on the matter. It skirted the question of a joint approach to the United States authorities suggesting that the United Kingdom should "in the first instance" sound out the United States authorities.

3. The Australian Government does not plan to oppose the United Kingdom proposal. It would not, however, join in a joint démarche to Washington. When in due course the United Kingdom approach leads the United States authorities to enquire about the future of the Australian contingent, the Australians would explain that it would not be practicable to retain their contingent once the United Kingdom element was withdrawn.

4. Mr. Sandys informed Mr. Dulles, during his visit to Washington on January 29, that the United Kingdom wished to withdraw the United Kingdom contingent from Korea as soon as possible. Mr. Dulles is reported to have said that he would be sorry to see the Commonwealth division withdrawn, as he did not like to see the United Nations forces scaled down in this manner. He said that the presence of the Commonwealth contingent had a great effect in restraining Syngman Rhee from rash adventures. He wondered whether a facade of Commonwealth representation might not be preserved by the maintenance of liaison officers in Korea.

[110] Note marginale :/Marginal Note:
If we adopt a different policy from that of the U.S. there will be a real danger that we might become a channel for US exports to China. This in turn would endanger our preferred position as an importer to the U.S. No public statement should be in conflict with any practice we may have to adopt to protect that position. W.D. M[atthews]

5. The Department of External Affairs believes that there is some, though probably dwindling, political advantage to be obtained from the retention of Commonwealth forces in Korea, and that Canada should not take part in a joint démarche to the State Department. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff, agrees that there is some value in keeping the United Nations characteristic of the force in Korea, even though the present Commonwealth contingent there has no particular military value.

6. The economic arguments which have probably led the United Kingdom to make their proposal can be appreciated. We must, as well, admit the right of the United Kingdom to withdraw its troops from Korea if, in its view, circumstances warrant that withdrawal. In the circumstances, however, we see no reason why we should press the United States to agree to a withdrawal of the Commonwealth forces, even though we cannot object to the United Kingdom making its case. The retention of the small Canadian unit currently in Korea (approximately 22 personnel) is not a problem for us.

7. In view of the foregoing the following course of action is recommended:

(a) That we now inform the United Kingdom that:

(i) Canada would offer no objection to the withdrawal of United Kingdom troops from Korea;

(ii) the Canadian Government would not, at this stage, think it essential that a joint approach be made to the United States on the subject;

(iii) Canadian authorities would like to be kept informed of United Kingdom discussions with the United States authorities on the subject;

(iv) if the United Kingdom Government should decide to alter the size or the nature of its contribution, the future of the Commonwealth contingent and of the Canadian contribution, would have to be reviewed in the light of circumstances which would then exist.

(b) That our Embassy in Washington be instructed to indicate our attitude informally to the State Department.[111]

These recommendations were approved by Cabinet on March 7, 1957.
Ces recommandations ont été approuvées par le Cabinet, le 7 mars 1957.

KOREA: ARMAMENT REPLACEMENTS

You will see from our telegram Y-170 of April 16† that you or a member of your staff will probably be called in to be informed individually of U.S. desires in the matter of arms for the U.S. forces in Korea.[112] We are not yet in a position to express Ministerial or even Departmental views; indeed, much will depend upon the manner in which the subject is broached. However, in order that you may be able to know what our very tentative first thinking on this subject is and may be able to frame questions more purposefully, we are outlining below the direction which thinking is taking on the official level and the basis on which we intend to institute the necessary intra- and interdepartmental consultations in Ottawa.

2. We believe that from a purely military point of view a move toward modernization is probably desirable but other considerations, such as our involvement in armistice and cease-fire supervisory work elsewhere in the world where it is very much in our interests to encourage scrupulous observance of agreed terms, make us somewhat reluctant to appear to condone a possible violation, technical or other, of the Korean Armistice Agreement, even though we recognize that the provocation for such a possible violation has been great and that such a move can be justified on military grounds. We are aware that the United States will almost certainly press its wishes to a conclusion, and our concern is therefore concentrated more on the method by which the United States will seek to achieve its ends than on the ends themselves.

3. In your telegram No. 505 of March 4† you described the three possible methods foreseen by Mr. Dulles as:

(a) to argue that the Korean Armistice Agreement is no longer in force;

(b) to maintain that the KPA/CPV side had already violated the Armistice Agreement by introducing military equipment into North Korea and the U.S.A. would therefore be justified in doing the same;

(c) to take the view that the introduction of modern weapons into South Korea by the U.S.A. would not legally be a violation of Article 13(d) of the Agreement.

It would appear certain that the U.S. authorities have wisely decided to rule out the first alternative. Little thought therefore has been devoted to this course of action beyond assuming that we would oppose it strongly, an attitude which would no doubt be shared by the other interested powers with the probable exception of the ROK.

4. Recent information would seem to indicate that U.S. authorities apparently favour basing their action on the second alternative. In adopting such a course of action UNC would presumably argue that they would not be violating any provisions of the Armistice which the opposing side has not been disregarding for some time, a continuing process which has resulted in a KPA/CPV force which is more powerful now than at the time the agreement was signed.

Although we recognize the force of this type of argument and that the situation it describes is one of the main reasons for the modernization venture, we do not favour its use alone as the announced motive and justification. In the debate which could be expected to follow this move, we do not think it would be advisable to have the UNC clearly enunciating, as the basis of its policy, that violations are justified, even if undertaken in response to strong provocation. You will recall that this consideration formed the grounds for our objection to arguments put forward in support of the expulsion of the NNSC from South Korea last summer. Moreover, as the main and declared intention of the UNC, this argument as you have noted runs counter to presidential statements on the morality of Middle East policies, and while this criticism is not entirely likely from Communist sources it would no doubt be better if such conflicts and contradictions could be avoided or at least minimized. Finally there is the difficulty which the State Department has already mentioned, namely, the focussing of world attention on KPA/CPV violations in such a way as to muster support and understanding for the proposed move. Although the fact that violations have occurred is well known, their precise nature would have to be cited chapter and verse if the quid pro quo approach alone were to be effective and such substantiation the U.S. is apparently not prepared to give since the acquisition of this information is in itself a violation of the Agreement as pointed out in paragraph 3 of the New Zealand message we repeated in our telegram No. Y-170 of April 16.

16. The third or quote technical "alternative", although inconsistent with the statements of the UNC representative on the MAC at the time of the NNSC expulsion from South Korea regarding the "illegality" of KPA/CPV side actions in bringing modern weapons into North Korea, probably forms the basis of the most tenable position in the circumstances. In adopting this position the UNC might argue that, under the terms of the armistice, replacement of equipment is perfectly legal but compliance with the regulations concerning the identity of type and effectiveness would be impossible since the equipment now being used in Korea is no longer in production. Thus if new equipment were introduced, it could be described as being as nearly identical to the old as is possible in the changed circumstances of armament production. This plan of action presupposes, of course, that the whole modernization operation would be carried out quite openly and subject to the procedures which are now applicable to replacement and rotation, since it is difficult to see how such a process could be kept even in the twilight as the U.K. would appear, from London's telegram 761 of April 15†, to be advocating. Moreover this approach to the problem presupposes that, as Mr. Dulles informed Mr. Sandys, the U.S. is not attempting to bring about an absolute increase in military potential in Korea.

7. To our mind, the quid pro quo and technical arguments are not mutually exclusive and if the UNC position is based primarily on one, the other can be adduced as a reinforcement. As indicated above and in the interests of maintaining a semblance of legality, we are at present inclined to favour making the technical argument the main basis for the action, leaving the doctrine of reciprocal wrongs as a reply with which to meet the first onslaught of objections from the KPA/CPV side. This plan of action would leave what is essentially a defensive tactic to be used in a context where it would be appropriate while the main basis for action, i.e. technical reasons, is less susceptible to being interpreted as related primarily to the Korean situation.

8. In carrying out the programme envisaged above we assume that the usual report would be made to the NNSC. In addition we believe there would be some virtue in replacements being carried out as gradually as would be consistent with the maintenance in operational condition of the forces concerned. If technical reasons are put forward as the main basis for the modernization project, it would be advisable to forestall, if possible, its appearing as a sudden move undertaken with a sense of urgency. We are consulting our own military authorities about the possibility and the preferability of introducing new equipment by stages, waiting until the forces are largely re-equipped before undertaking their re-organization. The charge that the U.S. is planning to re-open hostilities will almost certainly be made and if this whole operation is carried out with an appearance of urgency the KPA/CPV side in their excitement might be convinced by their own propaganda. We shall be able to form a better opinion on these points when we have received military advice.

9. We should be grateful for your comments on this preliminary outline of our position; while you will not want to advance the foregoing argument, a knowledge of it may enable you to elicit additional information. We should be interested also in any further information or opinions you may be able to obtain in connection with the following aspects of the modernization programme.

(a) The role of the NNSC. Will it function throughout in its present truncated form? Is any thought being given to the possibility of reviving the mobile teams temporarily to inspect the importations, thereby indicating a literal interpretation of the "suspension" of the NNSC's rights in South Korea. While this is highly unlikely, if for no other reason than that the U.S. may not be anxious to give the Poles and Czechs any unnecessary opportunity to become familiar with the new equipment, it is nevertheless a possibility which may have been considered.

(b) On the question of the relationship between modernization and other military moves being contemplated in the Far East, we should be interested to know whether any thought has been given to the possible consequences of providing new equipment to UNC forces in Korea at about the same time as the transfer of U.S. Far Eastern Command Headquarters from Tokyo to Seoul. You will recall that when modernization was under consideration last summer we agreed with the U.K. position that the dust should be allowed to settle on the NNSC expulsion before any moves were made in this direction. The present combination of circumstances would appear to be comparable from the point of view of possible Communist reaction.

(c) We understand that although no nuclear warheads will be sent to Korea the provision of dual purpose weapons will form part of the modernization. This is of course a politically explosive issue in the Far East, especially in Japan at present, and we wonder what thought has been given in Washington to the publicity which may attend this aspect of the project.

10. We have marked this telegram for Canadian Eyes Only because of its reference to the New Zealand message transmitted to you earlier and because of the very tentative nature of its contents.

KOREA: ARMAMENT REPLACEMENTS

We attended a meeting this afternoon in the State Department of representatives of the Old Commonwealth on this subject.

2. Mr. Walter Robertson, who presided, outlined the background of the situation pointing out that the KPA/CPV side had made a scrap of paper out of Article 13d of the Armistice Agreement, bringing in aircraft, artillery and other military equipment in violation of the Agreement through points of entry other than those designated in the Agreement, and by rendering ineffective the inspection system through the assistance of the Poles and Czechs on the NNSC. The UNC on the other hand had meticulously observed the provisions of the Armistice Agreement and as a consequence now finds its forces operating with equipment no longer in use or in production and at a disadvantage militarily in comparison with KPA/CPV side. The situation could be rectified and a considerable saving effected if the UNC forces could be equipped with new and modern weapons. This move would also have the important effect of maintaining ROK morale.

3. Admiral Radford then explained in some detail the changes which had taken place in the military strength of the KPA/CPV side since the armistice and the reductions which had been made in the UNC forces. He pointed out that through the manipulation of the terms of the Armistice Agreement the Communists had built up their forces in North Korea while holding the UNC forces static. He said that it was the view of the USA military authorities that if steps were not taken to rectify the situation there would be a greater likelihood of a resumption of hostilities since weakness on the UNC side would invite aggression and furthermore the position of the UNC side at the conference table would be much weakened. He then produced the evidence available to show the extent of the Communist military build-up, arguing from the normal requirements of armed forces of the present size of the KPA/CPV side, from reconnaissance photographs of airfields in North Korea, from radar tracks of air activity over North Korea, and from admissions which the KPA/CPV side had made in the Military Armistice Commission. This evidence he said had been corroborated to a considerable extent by defectors from North Korea. For some time the military advice of the Joint Chiefs of Staff had been that the UNC forces in Korea must be modernized or face the possibility of defeat should hostilities be resumed. If the two USA divisions in Korea could be modernized with the most effective weapons it would be possible to ensure that no aggression would take place. A by-product to this would be the increased confidence of the ROK Government that a successful defence could be made against any possible sudden aggression and furthermore it might be possible to reduce the ROK Army by four divisions and thereby cut down the USA bill for foreign aid to Korea. Admiral Radford concluded by outlining the sort of equipment the USA defence authorities propose to introduce to Korea in a modernization programme.

4. Mr. Robertson then invited suggestions from the Commonwealth representatives as to how the political problem posed by the necessity for modernizing the UNC forces might best be handled. The British Ambassador enquired as to what the USA thought would be the best arguments to deploy in defence of a modernization programme and what procedure was contemplated — whether it was proposed to inform the Secretary General of the UN by letter or to carry the programme out and say nothing publicly. Mr. Robertson indicated that the USA authorities had an open mind on the subject and wished to hear the judgement and the reaction of the Commonwealth representatives.

5. The New Zealand Ambassador emphasized that it would be necessary to prove to the world that the Communists had violated the Cease Fire Agreement in the manner indicated by the USA intelligence reports. He also emphasized, as did the Australian representative, the importance of timing in any modernization programme, and expressed his personal opinion that if it was done close to the time of the next session of the UN General Assembly, the move would stir up a formidable hornet's nest. Several attempts were made to elicit from the USA representatives what sort of timetable they had in mind for laying on their modernization programme, but no specific reply was given. We enquired whether a rapid operation was contemplated but Admiral Radford indicated that while the defence authorities were ready and anxious to move on this as soon as possible, it was not expected that the new equipment would be rushed in over a short period.

6. In the course of discussion Robertson said that there appeared to be two courses of action open, namely: to apply a liberal interpretation to Article 13d, and by legal arguments to stretch its provisions to cover the modernization programme; or to argue that Communist action had in effect suspended the operation of Article 13d of the Armistice Agreement and therefore justified the UNC re-equipment programme. While he emphasized that the USA authorities had an open mind on the subject and that no course of action had yet been ruled out, he gave his personal opinion that the UNC ought to re-equip its forces in an above board manner providing public information, at least in general terms of what was being done.

7. The meeting was not particularly satisfactory since the Americans were unwilling to commit themselves to anything but the military necessity of carrying out the re-equipment programme and the Commonwealth representatives were unwilling or not in a position to urge any particular course of action. The only point of general agreement was that no one wished to see the armistice as a whole jeopardized, or its provisions other than those in Article 13d called into question. The indication was that we would hear further from the Americans when their views on how to handle this problem had matured further.

8. The British Ambassador commented wryly after the meeting that the USA, having followed a high moral line in the Mideast situation, were seeking advice from the Commonwealth on how to misbehave internationally in order to get out of their difficulties in Korea. By taking the initiative in inviting suggestions from the Old Commonwealth representatives the State Department has no doubt succeeded in some measure in obviating later criticism of such proposals as they may put forward, though all representatives made it clear that they had expected to ask questions rather than give advice. We were not asked to bring any proposals to a subsequent meeting.

KOREA: ARMAMENT REPLACEMENTS

The essence of what we have been asked to do by the State Department in the meeting of April 23 and by the U.S. Embassy in an approach here on April 25, is to offer suggestions as to the manner in which the intention of the United States to re-equip its two divisions in Korea should be justified. We have not been invited to comment upon the "necessity for modernizing the UNC forces" which has been stated to us as an assumption. Unless we are to challenge this necessity, the problem is therefore largely a procedural one and the views which are expressed in this telegram should be passed on as personal rather than official.

2. For your own information, the Canadian military authorities consider that "it is essential for the United States to modernize the equipment of its forces in Korea in the general programme of modernizing the whole of the 19 divisions of the United States Army ... this re-organization includes not only the provision of new types of armament but also a modified organization, and to a considerable extent, a modified tactical doctrine. In order to support these divisions in the field the programmes and training methods of the U.S. schools, training establishments and test and development stations will also be required to change their programmes, and the training of recruit, NCOs, specialists and officers will be based in future on this new type of equipment and organization and to meet the new tactical doctrine. It would therefore appear to be unsound and unreasonable to expect the United States to maintain separate schools, training facilities, test and delivery systems to look after the two divisions in Korea. We believe that this aspect of the problem is of much more significance than the one raised at the conference in Washington about the availability of equipment and spare parts now that these older weapons are out of production. It is only too obvious to any military expert that if the United States are going to re-organize their 19 divisions they will throw out a great deal of this equipment which is now in use in Korea and there should be no difficulty in providing all the spare parts required from the equipment of the remaining divisions which are to be re-organized and the pipeline and depot holdings in the United States. It is therefore quite apparent that the United States forces in Korea should be re-equipped in line with the re-equipping of the whole of the U.S. forces ... however, it is for consideration whether any special priority should be given to the re-equipping of these two divisions in Korea, or whether it would not be more acceptable if these two divisions were re-organized in the normal course of the development of the U.S. army."

3. It appears evident that the U.S. military authorities have decided to give priority to the re-equipment of the two divisions in Korea because they have so far modernized only one of their 19 divisions, and we can only speculate as to their motives. You will recall that when Mr. Duncan Sandys, the U.K. Minister of Defence, visited Washington early this year, he was assured by Mr. Dulles that the United States did not wish to increase the military potential of the U.S. forces in Korea. You later reported that this assurance was linked with the desire of the United States Treasury Department to reduce the U.S. financial commitment for the maintenance of Korean forces, and by the assertion of the U.S. military that it would be necessary to increase the strength of the U.S. forces in Korea in order to create the possibility that some Korean forces could be placed in reserve. From the way the issue is now developing, it appears that the strengthening of the U.S. forces is a certainty but that the reduction of the Korean forces is more problematical.

4. According to our assessment of the situation, there is no likelihood that we could — nor is it clear that we should — dissuade the United States from its intention of pressing ahead with the modernization of the two U.S. divisions in Korea. As you will see from the preceding paragraphs, there is a good case to be made for this modernization although questions could be asked about the timing of it. Our aim in making personal suggestions on the procedure for handling this modernization should therefore be to try to secure some subsidiary benefits and at the same time both to avoid alarming the Communist side unduly and to do our best to make these developments as palatable as we can to neutrals. It can presumably be taken for granted that there will be no real problem in presenting the case for modernization to the people of the Western Alliance and its supporters. Nothing we could say and no way in which we could present this development would be likely to make the modernization itself more appealing to countries such as India, but it is in the interest of all of us not to make the modernization more unappealing than it has to be.

5. We are glad that there appears to be no disposition anywhere in the United States Government to approach the problem of presentation by arguing that the Korean Armistice Agreement is no longer in force. We would like to see the case presented cover the following points:

(a) The United Nations command should describe in as specific terms as possible the way in which the Communist side has already violated the Armistice Agreement by the introduction of new equipment. While we are aware that being specific might indicate the methods by which the UNC reached its opinion, we wonder whether the United Nations command could not make specific statements and refuse to say more than that the information was gathered by reliable and normal intelligence methods. The point which the spokesman for the UNC side made at the 71st meeting of the Military Armistice Commission on June 4, 1956 illustrates the way in which this might be done. According to the verbatim transcript of that meeting which you forwarded under letter No. 795 of June 5, 1956,† he said: "You have not since the beginning of the Armistice Agreement reported one single combat aircraft as having been brought into Korea. Yet we know you have introduced 400 to 500 modern aircraft into the area of your side. Do you expect the world to believe that this modern airforce of yours has ... operated for three years without even a single replacement aircraft?"

(b) The UNC should affirm in the clearest and most explicit terms its intention to observe strictly the ceasefire provisions of the armistice, in order that there may be a clear distinction between the intention of the UNC not to renew hostilities and the intention of the UNC not to be at a disadvantage in comparison with the Communist side in the light of the unexpected prolongation of the life of the Armistice Agreement through the lack of a definitive political settlement. The Armistice Agreement, of course, was intended to be a temporary agreement and was not drawn up with a view to lasting for four years and more. The United Nations command could therefore reasonably argue that a point must be reached where the passage of time must render some of the detailed administrative provisions of the Armistice Agreement inoperable while leaving the basic purpose of the agreement intact.

(c) The United Nations command should state that it is not its intention to increase the total strength of the United Nations command forces in Korea above the level of July, 1953, or, in other words, to initiate any form of arms race in Korea. The United Nations command could indicate that it would have been open to it to redress the balance in the same clandestine manner as the Communist side used to upset it, but that instead it is proceeding openly in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to its intention to continue to observe the ceasefire and merely to seek redress. It should state its intention to continue to submit reports, as it has done in the past, to the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission.

(d) In our view, this approach could be made more convincing to the Communist side (and thereby reduce the risk of creating panic on that side with possible harmful repercussions, including an arms race) and more convincing to neutrals like India, if it could be coupled with the announcement of the agreement of the Republic of Korea to reduce its standing army by placing four divisions in reserve, as Admiral Radford suggested might be possible. It seems to us that this is the best way, moreover, to justify the modernization of the two U.S. divisions in Korea ahead of some of the other sixteen which remain to be modernized.

6. In putting forward the suggestions contained in paragraph 5 above, you will no doubt wish to make it clear that we are passing on these thoughts because we have been asked to comment. If a different course is followed, we are of course in no way committed to give active support to the United States in defence of its method of presentation.

7. You might be interested in one further aspect of the re-equipping of the two U.S. divisions to which we are giving some attention. The introduction of dual-purpose weapons creates the possibility that atomic warheads may at some time be used in Korea. As you know there has, almost from the beginning of the Korean War, been a custom of consultation between the USA in its capacity as the Unified Command and the representatives of the countries contributing forces to serve under the United Nations Command on important issues. The decision to employ atomic warheads would, in our current view, constitute an important issue exceeding earlier instances such as hot pursuit and an advance beyond the 38th parallel. Earlier consultations were carried out in the light of contributions of forces much more substantial than those which we now make. The point to which we are giving thought is the degree of likelihood that the USA would consult its allies among the sixteen before deciding to employ atomic weapons. In other words, how great is the degree of civilian control on both the U.S. national and the international plane likely to be? There are obvious dangers in broaching this question with the USA which might consider that such enquiries afford an opportunity to systematize defence arrangements in Korea (or even in the Far East as a whole) on some less tenuous basis than the warning declaration of 1953. You might be able to offer some observations on this aspect of re-equipment either from your past contacts with the State Department or from information which will become available during your current discussions. We should not, of course, wish you to raise this problem with the State Department in an overt manner.

KOREA ARMAMENT REPLACEMENTS

The State Department convened a meeting with Old Commonwealth Ambassadors yesterday on this subject under the chairmanship of Mr. Walter Robertson. The new Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, and other State Department and Pentagon officials were present.

2. After recalling that at the meeting of April 23 Commonwealth representatives had asked for USA proposals as to how this problem should be handled, Mr. Robertson read a draft outline of a plan, the text of which is going forward to you in a separate message.†[113] We are sending this text to Ottawa only, as Robertson was initially not disposed to pass out copies, and requested that it be given restricted circulation to prevent leaks to the press.

3. In sum, the plan calls for a statement in the MAC no later than July 1/57, recalling Communist violations of the Armistice Agreement, stating UNC desire to maintain the agreement, claiming that Communist violations have upset the relative military balance, and arguing that in view of this the UNC considers that it is entitled to be relieved of corresponding obligations until the balance has been restored and the Communists have demonstrated their willingness to comply with Article 13(d); accordingly the UNC proposes to replace its weapons with new items. Simultaneously a joint State-Defence statement would be issued in Washington, and a report would be made to the UN before August 1.

4. The British Ambassador, expressing the UK wish to be sympathetic with the USA desire to take the modernization steps, made three main points:

(a) It was important in the presentation of the UNC case to provide as much detailed material as possible on Communist violations of Article 13(d);

(b) It should be made abundantly clear that the UNC was not denouncing the Armistice Agreement as a whole;

(c) Special attention should be paid to timing: the UN should be informed as soon as possible after the statement had been made in the MAC; the sixteen should be informed before the plan was implemented; and the Swiss and Swedes should also be given advance notice.

5. Commenting on these points, Robertson said that the State Department had considered the possibility of informing some of the NATO powers — he mentioned Turkey and France — and possibly the Thais as well. He emphasized that there was no desire to withhold the report to the UN until August 1, and agreed that it should be rendered sooner if possible. Robertson said that they had also thought it desirable to inform the Swiss and Swedes of what was afoot.

6. The New Zealand Ambassador concurred in the points made by his British colleague and said that his government would like definite assurance that the ROK forces would not be provided with dual purpose weapons in connection with the modernization programme. Robertson assured him that this step had not been considered. Referring to the draft outline plan, the NZ Ambassador questioned the wisdom of the statement that Communist violations of the Armistice Agreement "strike at the very heart of the agreement". He was afraid that this language might suggest that the structure of the armistice would come apart because of Communist violations of Article 13(d) and UNC intentions to regard this article as suspended.

7. The Australian Ambassador said he thought it would be preferable to refer to the Armistice Agreement as designed to freeze the military status quo rather than to maintain the relative military balance. He also thought the statement that "The UNC intends to observe all the provisions of the Armistice Agreement other than those as to which it is entitled to be relieved from compliance because of Communist violations" was rather too loosely phrased and would suggest that UNC intention was to regard more than Article 13(d) as suspended. He suggested an alternative wording along the following lines: "the UNC intends fully to observe all provisions of the Armistice Agreement save to the extent to which it is entitled to be relieved from compliance because of Communist violation."

8. The Australian Ambassador also said that great importance should be attached to the manner in which the UNC case was presented publicly. In view of the public debate which would inevitably follow the UNC announcement, it would be important to provide as much detail as possible concerning Communist breaches of the Armistice Agreement. The NZ Ambassador urged that the report to the UN should be made as early as possible and that as many governments as possible should be notified in advance of what was intended to be done in order to secure maximum support for the UNC position. At the same time he thought that there should not be too much publicity attached to the UNC. With respect to the report to the UN, Robertson emphasized that UNC did not wish to go to the UN seeking permission for what it intended to do or to give governments with no responsibility in the area an opportunity of attempting to dictate how the UNC should handle the matter.

9. In response to enquiries as to whether it would be possible to announce the reduction of South Korean forces at the same time that UNC intentions are indicated to the UN, State Department officials expressed doubt that this would be possible. They said that negotiations with the ROK Government on this subject would be initiated as soon as possible, but no guarantee could be given as to when agreement would be reached on this question. Concerning the details of Communist violations of the Cease Fire Agreement, USA officials said that much of the info made available to the meeting of April 23 on this subject could be made public.

10. We outlined the points made in paragraph 5 of your telegram Y215 May 13. With respect to your item (c), (i.e. that the UN command should state that it is not its intention to increase the total strength of the UN command forces in Korea above the level of July 1953), Robertson said that he did not think the UNC could make such an advance undertaking without a similar one from the Communist side. He thought it would not be wise for the UNC to bind itself unconditionally in this way. Robertson said he did not know how to answer our suggestion that the UNC should state its intention to continue to submit reports to the NNSC. It was clear from what he said that the USA initial view was that reports would not be submitted as long as the Communist side continued to make no such reports. Robertson suggested that the rendering of such reports would only embarrass the Swiss and Swedes and would involve recording with the NNSC admissions of violations which the Communists could exploit in propaganda. We did not receive the impression however that the USA authorities have completely made up their minds on this question: one of the USA officials suggested that if the UNC did make reports to the NNSC they would be in the most general terms. It was nevertheless apparent that the USA authorities were contemplating that cessation of reports to the NNSC would leave no remaining functions to that body and thus enable it to dissolve.

11. As indicated previously, Robertson said that no commitment could be made with respect to an announcement concerning reduction of the ROK forces; although this was definitely their intention it was not expected that a statement to this effect could be included in the UNC announcement.

12. We put to Robertson the question suggested in paragraph 2 of your YY227, May 16,† as to whether consideration had been given to proposing the revision of Article 13(d) in the MAC. Robertson declared himself as firmly and emphatically opposed to this idea and indicated that it would not be considered for a moment. He recalled that the Armistice Agreement compromised three elements: a Cease Fire Agreement, an agreement to political conference within 90 days, and the limitations on reinforcements contained in Article 13(d). He said that the only provision which the Communist side had kept was the ceasefire itself. He referred to the belief that fifteen USA flyers were still held by the Communist side and to the 450 military personnel who had not been satisfactorily accounted for as indications of the cavalier disregard of the Communists for their obligations under the Armistice Agreement. He also referred to the Chinese Communist breach of the agreement with the USA concerning the release of American citizens in Communist jails. He said that in view of this sort of record nothing could possibly be gained by negotiating anything further with the Communist side and to propose such negotiation would dignify them with the suggestion that they were capable of observing their commitments to the Armistice Agreements.

13. In concluding, Robertson stressed that the USA draft outline plan was very tentative and preliminary in nature and would be subject to further alteration and amendment. He undertook to let us know of any radical changes the USA authorities might make and said that we would be provided with copies when a final draft had been agreed to by the various USA authorities concerned.

14. When we were speaking to Nes (Korean Desk Officer) this morning about Korean claims he mentioned that the State Department intended to inform the French, Turks and Thais of USA plans with respect to re-equipping their divisions in Korea on May 20. The plan would then be worked over in the light of comments made by governments informed and further consideration by the USA authorities, and a final version of the plan would be put before a meeting of the sixteen which it was hoped would be held before June 15. Nes indicated that the State Department would be interested in any further comments we might wish to make.

15. With respect to the reduction of ROK forces, Nes said that the USA was planning to propose a package deal to President Rhee at the same time as the UNC statement is made in the MAC. This deal would involve the reduction of ROK forces by four divisions over the space of one year or eighteen months and to be compensated for by the increased fire power of the two USA divisions and the wing of jet aircraft for the ROK airforce. In so far as additional comments to the State Department are concerned, we believe one point on which we might profitably express further views is the matter of reporting to the NNSC. Other Commonwealth representatives did not take firm positions on this question and it is possible that the USA authorities might take a further look at this if we were to urge them to do so.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 106-57 Ottawa, May 24, 1957

WITHDRAWAL OF COMMONWEALTH FORCES FROM KOREA

At its meeting on March 7, Cabinet approved the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that Canada should not object to the withdrawal of United Kingdom troops from Korea and further, that if the United Kingdom altered the size or nature of its contribution to the Commonwealth Forces in Korea, the future of the Canadian contribution to the Commonwealth Forces would have to be reviewed.

Since that decision was taken, the United Kingdom Government has reached a firm decision to withdraw its contingent from Korea. The Canadian authorities were informed recently that the United Kingdom contingent would be withdrawn between mid-July and mid-August. Australian and New Zealand contingents will be withdrawn at the same time. The Commander, Canadian Military Mission, Far East, has recommended that the Canadian contingent be repatriated during July.

United Kingdom authorities have suggested that an integrated Commonwealth liaison staff, accredited to the United Nations Command, should be retained in Korea. There is a good deal of uncertainty still as to what the United Kingdom authorities have in mind. Officials are of the opinion that Canada should not participate formally in an integrated Commonwealth liaison staff, but that the Canadian Military Attaché in Tokyo should be accredited to the Commander-In-Chief, United Nations Command, and that his terms of reference should be altered as required. Mr. Campney has concurred in this view.

Late in April the State Department was informed that since firm decisions had been taken by other Commonwealth Governments to withdraw their forces in Korea, it would seem that the raison d'être of the Canadian Medical Detachment in Korea would disappear and that the Canadian Government would probably consider that the appropriate course would be to withdraw our Medical Unit. (There are approximately 30 Canadian service personnel in Korea, making up a Medical Detachment.) The State Department expressed the hope that, if and when the Canadian unit was withdrawn, the Canadian Government would make some public re-affirmation of its support for United Nations principles in Korea and, more specifically, for the undertakings in the July 1953 Declaration.

Previous statements on the reduction of Canadian forces in Korea have not contained references of this sort, but the fact that the withdrawal of the Medical Detachment will mean the termination of any Canadian military contribution to the United Nations Command suggests that some general statement of support for United Nations objectives in Korea would be appropriate. A specific statement of support for the Warning Declaration of July 1953 would exceed comparable action by the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand in their recent statements on the withdrawal of their forces. It would also entail the disadvantage of committing the Canadian Government further to a support of a declaration which was couched in language stronger than most of the allies of the United States desired. It is the view of officials that undue emphasis on this earlier declaration would do nothing to ease tensions in the area.

It is suggested, therefore, that the Minister of National Defence be authorized to include in his statement on the withdrawal of the Medical Detachment a paragraph along the lines set out in the recommendations below.

Recommendations

In view of the foregoing, it is recommended:

(a) That the Secretary of State for External Affairs be authorized to inform the United States authorities, in their capacity as the Unified Command, and the United Kingdom, Australian and New Zealand authorities

(i) that the Canadian Medical Detachment in Korea will be withdrawn in coordination with the withdrawal of the remainder of the Commonwealth contingent in Korea;

(ii) that the Canadian Military Attaché in Tokyo will be accredited as the Canadian Liaison Officer, and that the Canadian representative on the Participating Nations Advisory Group, United Nations Command, Military Armistice Commission in Korea, will be accredited as the Assistant Canadian Liaison Officer to the Commander-In-Chief, United Nations Command, in addition to their present duties.

(b) That the Minister of National Defence be authorized to include in any statement which he makes with respect to the withdrawal of the Canadian Detachment, something along the following lines: "The Minister of National Defence emphasized that, while there will now be no Canadian military unit operating in Korea, Canada remains firm in its support of the maintenance of the armistice. Canada firmly supports, as it always has, the objectives of the United Nations in Korea; the achievement of a unified, independent and democratic Korea, under a representative form of Government. Canada continues to believe that these objectives can best be achieved by peaceful means."[114]

KOREAN ARMAMENT REPLACEMENTS

While discussing Korean claims negotiations with Nes of the Korean desk today, he enquired whether any further comments on the USA proposals had been received from you.

2. Nes said that it was the State Department's intention to provide President Eisenhower with an appraisal of the views expressed by other governments concerned together with recommendations as to the extent of modernization of the two USA divisions in Korea required and the timing of a public announcement. He said that the President attached particular importance to maintaining a common front with other governments concerned on matters of this importance. Nes gave us to understand that it was the President's idea that other governments should be consulted to the extent that they have been in connection with the plans for modernizing the USA forces in Korea.

3. Nes went on to say that the State Department did not regard the informal comments made by Commonwealth Ambassadors at the two meetings of April 23 and May 16, and by the French, Turks and Thais at subsequent meetings as sufficiently considered views for purposes of reporting to the President. Further comments have been received from the UK, NZ, Turkey and Australia: the State Department hopes to hear further from us. In view of the political crisis in France it is not necessarily expected that further comments will be available from the French.

4. Nes said that the State Department were still hoping to present their appraisal to the President during the first week of June with a view to making their statement in the MAC in the last week in June.

5. In view of the foregoing, it would be helpful if you could let us know whether you expect to be sending further comments on the USA draft proposal set forth in our telegram 1167 May 17.†

6. Nes' remarks about the interest which the President has taken in this matter and the importance he attached to the consultation with other governments concerned on important issues relating to Korea is the only indication we have so far (and it is in no sense specific) which suggests that there is some degree of likelihood that the USA would consult its allies amongst the sixteen before deciding to employ atomic weapons. KOREAN ARMAMENT REPLACEMENTS

For Léger from Robertson, Begins: I went on Wednesday to a briefing session at the Pentagon, on Communist breaches of the Korean Armistice. The meeting had, I believe, been arranged at the instance of Sir Percy Spender, who was accompanied by Sir Philip McBride, the Australian Defence Minister. The other Old Commonwealth countries were represented — Canada by Rae, Sparling and myself. The object of the exercise was to assess how strong a public case, based on overt sources of info, could be made, say in the UN Assembly, if the UN command were challenged on their replacement of obsolescent and rundown equipment by contemporary weapons.

2. I was fully satisfied from the USA presentation that the North Korean and/or the "Chinese peoples volunteers" had begun to welsh on their armistice undertaking not to import new and additional equipment practically from the day the Agreement came into force.

3. However, what I find worrying is the conjuncture in time of this new move in Korea with the President's determination to seek at least a preliminary disarmament agreement with the USSR.

4. You will recall Admiral Radford's recent public statement, when asked about the prospects of a disarmament agreement that, "you could not rely on any undertaking given by any Communist Government".[115] The President, in the press conference he gave after the National Security Council's consideration of Stassen's report, in effect, disavowed Radford and confirmed his determination to seek a disarmament agreement with the USSR.[116] Since then his freedom of manoeuvre had already been to some extent limited by the commitment which appears to have been given Adenauer about aerial inspection zones in Europe. If the next step is to be a public indictment of Chinese and Korean breaches of the Armistice Agreement, not only will the diplomatic climate in which negotiations with the Russians are proceeding be worsened but, more seriously, the chances of USA public and congressional opinion accepting any agreement that might be negotiated are bound to be very gravely prejudiced.

5. For these reasons I am now inclined to think that our very tentative inquiry whether the renegotiation of the Armistice Agreement might be examined as a preferable alternative to a policy of knock for knock should be seriously considered and perhaps pressed pretty hard at a higher level here than that in which the Korean discussions have been taking place.

6. At the Pentagon conference I was struck by the American briefing officer's insistence that the first major error that their negotiating team had made was to accept an Armistice Agreement which did not provide for reciprocal aerial inspection. I had the impression that they did not think that the flagrant breaches of the agreement which appear to have been going on for some years could have taken place if the parties to the armistice or the Neutral Nations Supervisory Team had the right of effective aerial inspection. Now that the idea of aerial inspection is very much in the public mind and I suspect high in Stassen's priority list for any preliminary agreement with the USSR, I have been wondering whether a serious effort to get such a provision incorporated in a renegotiation of the Korean Armistice

Agreement would not be politically and diplomatically better than the tactics on which the USA has very nearly reached agreement with other members of the Committee of 16.[117]

7. So far as we know, the question of how best to proceed in Korea has not been related in people's minds to the question of whether we should now be trying to get a disarmament agreement with the USSR but it is interesting that the people who have been handling the Korean consultation come from the camp which does not believe that any agreement with any Communists is feasible or desirable.

KOREA: ARMAMENT REPLACEMENTS

It would appear to us that the likelihood of our being able to influence substantially the main outline of U.S. policy is small and although Nes indicated that further comments would be welcome we interpreted Robertson's remarks as meaning that any further "radical" changes would be initiated only by the USA (paragraphs 14 and 13 of your telegram 1166). Consequently, our comments and suggestions for the most part concern peripheral aspects of the U.S. proposal but there may be some advantage in making our views known to the State Department at the present time as suggested in your telegram 1260.

2. We would urge that throughout the proposed statement, the main emphasis should be placed on the armistice in the sense of an absence of hostilities rather than on the Agreement itself, since the main control provisions of the Agreement have been considerably modified and will be even more modified if the USA proceeds as planned. At the time of the NNSC expulsion last year, the UNC's intention to observe the other provisions of the Agreement was reaffirmed. Obviously there are drawbacks to making this reaffirmation in conjunction with statements of intention to vary some specific provision of the Armistice Agreement on several occasions, especially when the process of withering away of the Agreement's control provisions has made considerable progress already. We therefore believe that it might be wiser to rephrase final subsection 3, paragraph 1, of your 1167 to read "the UNC intends to maintain the armistice by all means within its power, as it has done previously and, for its part, regards the cease fire as inviolable".

[117] Note marginale :/Marginal Note:
could not undo the Communist aerial buildup already completed since Armistice signed in '53
A.R. M[enzies]

3. Following this same line of argument we strongly support the New Zealand Ambassador's objections (paragraph 6, your telegram 1166) to the phrase "strike at the very heart of the Agreement" since the heart of the Agreement is surely the cease fire itself. Instead it might be pointed out that the KPA/CPV violations in engaging in a secret arms build-up have endangered peace in the area, which the UNC is anxious to preserve. We were also interested in the Australian Ambassador's observations on the purpose of the agreement (paragraph 7, your telegram 1166). We think that if the original text is to be varied it might be preferable to combine both ideas in some such statement as "the Armistice Agreement was designed to freeze the military status quo on the principle of maintaining the relative military balance existing at the time the Agreement was signed. However, since this design has been disturbed, the UNC must return to the basic principle on which the Armistice Agreement was based in the interests of maintaining the spirit of the Agreement".

4. On reporting to the NNSC, we think that such action should be undertaken but agree that it would have to be in general terms, and to this we would have no objections. There would be some propaganda advantage in the UNC being able to claim that whereas the KPA/CPV side had modernized its equipment furtively, the UNC was at least not being underhanded in taking action into which it had been provoked by earlier KPA/CPV violations. Furthermore, if the U.S. authorities are looking to a dissolution of the NNSC, we would surmise that such a development is as likely with general reports as it is with no reports at all, judging from the intimation of Swiss intentions contained in Berne's letter No. 256 of May 15.† Moreover, Swiss withdrawal in these circumstances could be expected to be less embarrassing to the UNC.

5. On the problem of timing we believe that if the operation is to be carried out this year it should be done as swiftly as possible in order to be completed well before the General Assembly meets in the autumn so that if any discussion does ensue it will be of a fait accompli which has already been adequately discussed in public and not of a project then in progress or coming up freshly for debate. We think however that there would be some advantage in saying that it is open to question whether this is a wise time to undertake this exercise because of the effect it may have on the disarmament negotiations in London. The indictment of Communist behaviour in relation to the Korean Armistice Agreement may make it more difficult for U.S. public opinion to give serious consideration to some first step in disarmament and the evident intention of the U.S. to set the Armistice Agreement aside in the interest of modernization of armaments in Korea would normally make the Soviet Union more hesitant to enter into a disarmament agreement with the U.S.

6. We hope these comments will be of some assistance to you in discussions with the State Department. At the same time we would find helpful any indications of U.S. thinking on the problems of civilian control of nuclear weapons as discussed in paragraph 7 of our telegram Y-215 of May 10 which you may be able to add to paragraph 6 of your telegram 1260. We would also be interested in receiving information regarding the further comments mentioned in paragraph 3 of your telegram 1260 which the U.K., New Zealand, Turkey and Australia have put forward.

KOREA — ARMAMENT REPLACEMENTS

This afternoon we left with Nes (Korean Desk Officer) an informal memo recapitulating the points we made at the May 16 meeting and containing further comments based on paragraphs two to four of your telegram under reference.

2. With reference to paragraph 2 of your telegram Nes said he was not prepared to comment on our suggestion. We received the impression, however, that the Australian suggestion for the wording of the final subsection 3 of paragraph 1 of the draft outline plan (along the lines indicated in paragraph 7 of our telegram 1166) had been agreeable to the State Department.

3. With reference to your paragraph 3 Nes indicated that the phrase "strike at the very heart of the agreement" had already been revised out of the draft outline plan. The second point in your paragraph 3 has also been largely met by a revision of the sentence concerned which now reads "a cardinal purpose of these provisions was to ensure the freezing of the military status quo by maintaining the relative military balance existing on July 27/53."

4. With respect to your paragraph 4, Nes said that the State Department had in mind two disadvantages with respect to the rendering of the reports to the NNSC. It was thought these reports would embarrass the Swiss and the Swedes and it was felt that these reports would enable the Communists to file a long series of charges of violations which could be exploited for propaganda purposes. Nes indicated that the State Department was interested in the New Zealand proposal (reference our telegram 1305, June 5†) for the making of one or two general reports to the MAC during the period of reequipment.

5. Nes expressed appreciation for our suggestions and said that they would be given careful consideration.

6. With respect to the future timetable, Nes said that the question of reequipment of the two USA divisions in Korea with dual purpose weapons, was on the agenda of the National Security Council Meeting for June 13. If the decision was favourable the State Department would complete the drafting of the statement to the MAC and would probably meet first once again with the Old Commonwealth Governments to go over these final revisions. This meeting with Commonwealth Governments would probably be held within a week after the National Security Council meeting. Subsequently, there would be a meeting of the full sixteen which would be largely on an info basis.

7. We are reporting separately on our discussions of the relationship of the Korean reequipment programme with the disarmament talks.[118]

STRICTLY CONFIDENTIAL Tokyo, November 7, 1956

Mr. Howe was accompanied by Mr. M.W. Sharp and myself — Mr. Kono was accompanied by Vice-Minister Kiyoi, Food Agency Administrative Chief Mr. Ogura, Mr. Saito, Chief of the Secretariat of the Agriculture and Forestry Department and Mr. H. Takeuchi, First Section, European and American Affairs Division, Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Kono indicated that since his return he has had discussions with the Cabinet and with the Foreign Ministry and Ministry of International Trade and Industry, concerning the purchase of Canadian grain. He suggested a three-year secret agreement with respect to the purchase of Canadian grain. As this suggestion was discussed, it was understood that there could be no definitions of quantities as between wheat and barley and that would have to be determined as the occasion arose.

The price was to be the current price for Canadian grain at time of shipment. It was suggested that for the next three years, Japan would agree to buy 850 thousand tons each year as a minimum.

Mr. Howe suggested that he was thinking in terms of one million tons. Mr. Kono said that this was the figure they had in mind but from the standpoint of safety so far as they were concerned, he was making the suggestion of 850,000 tons as a minimum.

When Mr. Kono made his proposal, Mr. Howe said that it was contrary to Canadian policy to offer any price concessions to Japan in return for a long-term contract and that Canada always sold at the same price to all customers. He pointed out that both the United Kingdom and Germany were larger customers than Japan. Mr. Kono said in reply that he was not thinking in terms of any special prices, that he was quite content that Japan should pay the going international price for Canadian wheat.

Mr. Howe suggested that it would make it much more easy to meet the requirement of Japan if Canada knew the programme six months in advance, in order that the supplies could be in position in Vancouver for shipment.

Mr. Howe also suggested that if they cared to make a purchase for the next six months now, the price would be the current price at the time of purchase. Mr. Kono stated that he would discuss this proposal with his colleagues.

Mr. Kono said he put forward this suggestion of a long-term understanding in the interest of stabilizing trade between Canada and Japan and Mr. Howe assured him that such a contract would be most beneficial in the attainment of that objective.

Note: It was understood that the negotiations to carry this agreement into effect, would be conducted between the Foreign Office and the Canadian Embassy.[119]

Memorandum by Ambassador in Japan

STRICTLY CONFIDENTIAL Tokyo, November 7, 1956

Following the discussion covering wheat and barley summarized in the attached memo, Mr. Kono raised the question of the purchase of iron ore from British Columbia for the use of Japanese steel mills. Mr. Howe suggested that it might be possible to organize a company to produce pig iron in British Columbia, and that the Japanese steel industry might be interested in contributing towards the financing of such an operation, and that the operation should be sufficiently large to take care not only of Japanese requirements but also of the requirements of the British Columbia market. Mr. Howe stated further that financing would be greatly facilitated if a twenty-year contract were arranged between Japanese consumers of pig iron and the proposed company. Mr. Kono then mentioned that there was a new company which has recently constructed a steel mill on the Chiba Peninsula (Kawasaki Steel Company), that this company does not produce pig iron but would be a heavy purchaser of it. Mr. Howe indicated that the proposed company would no doubt be very glad to cooperate with the Kawasaki Steel Company and with other steel producers in Japan. Mr. Howe told him that when he returned to Canada he would make appropriate investigations and would advise.

Mr. Kono then discussed the question of increased exports from Japan to Canada. Mr. Howe told him that Canada was capable of absorbing large quantities of imports. However, Japan should concentrate on supplying quality merchandise with the greatest emphasis being placed on steel pipe, machinery and other capital equipment.

LETTER NO. 790 Tokyo, November 9, 1956

VISIT TO JAPAN OF THE RIGHT HON. C.D. HOWE

Mr. Howe has come and gone, and I cannot begin to tell you how highly successful his visit was. He is, of course, a friend of the Japanese Ambassador in Ottawa and also of Mr. Kono, the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry here. Mr. Kono is the most powerful political figure in Japan and it is plainly evident that when he heard, through the Japanese Embassy in Ottawa, of Mr. Howe's proposed visit, he issued instructions that everyone was to go all out in making the arrangements. Mr. Kono was in Moscow at the time of Mr. Howe's arrival, but fortunately, he returned to Japan several days before his departure.

2. The responsibility for the itinerary for the visit was left in the more than capable hands of Mr. J.L. Mutter, Commercial Counsellor in this Embassy. He worked with a committee of Foreign Officials and, I think, a representative of the Ministry of International Trade and Industry. At all events, a complete itinerary was worked out prior to the arrival of Mr. Howe and Mr. Mitchell W. Sharp, his Deputy. The efficiency of the organization was evidenced by the case with which the itinerary was carried out. The whole tour was conducted with clocklike precision and there was not one hitch nor one unfortunate incident from beginning to end. I know that Mr. Howe was thoroughly pleased with everything and will undoubtedly have expressed his pleasure upon his return to Ottawa.

3. I am most enthusiastic about the wonderful impression he created everywhere. Fortunately he never gets the slightest bit flustered, nor did he ever exhibit the slightest degree of exhaustion, notwithstanding the hectic nature of the trip. He had engagements every day from morning till late at night and he took them all in his stride; at the end of each day he was perhaps less tired than any of the rest of us.

4. He was impressed, as I was, with the friendliness exhibited towards himself and Mr. Sharp and towards Canada and Canadians generally. I had never realized before the deep feeling of gratitude which this country has for Canada and this was so well exhibited on all sides right from governmental leaders down. Canada's attitude in connection with the negotiation of the trade treaty, the entry of Japan into GATT, our attempts to get Japan into the United Nations, and other gestures of Canadian friendship have made a deep and lasting impression in this country, and one could sense this at every turn.

5. Japan realizes its position in the world, and realizes that it must, for its own future and the welfare of its people, be closely associated with the western world or, in other words, the world of freedom. It realizes, too, that it owes an eternal debt of gratitude to the United States and the American people for doing so much to put this nation back on its feet again. The American attitude as an occupying power was something which these people never expected or hoped for, and was unbelievably lenient. The Japanese realize as well that the American market is an invaluable one to them and that there must be continued close association with the United States.

6. I have a feeling that the Japanese appreciate Canada's particular position in relation to both the United Kingdom and the United States, and that Canada can well be a mediator or link between Japan and these two nations. The fact that Canada has secured for herself the position of being one of the most influential members in the United Nations, and is looked upon with particular favor by the Asiatic nations, has not been overlooked by this country. Japan feels that Canada is a good nation to keep close to, as her influence with the nations of the world is capable of being of great help to this country in its association with all others. It is well that this condition exists as we have a deep interest in the Japanese market and, both being Pacific powers, the future of each is to a degree linked with the welfare and progress of the other.

7. Coming back to the tour itself, I am sure that Mr. Howe will be reporting to the Canadian people with respect to his impressions.[120]He left Japan with the certain knowledge that this country is a great modern industrial power with a population so large that manpower is readily available at extremely low wages. His trip confirmed these facts. He was deeply impressed with the agricultural industry and the great productivity of the limited land, which results from a hard-working farm population conducting its operations on a garden basis. Finally, he found general recognition by Japanese industrialists of the fact that if they want to trade in this world, they must produce high quality goods and not flood the markets of the world with any of their products.

8. I think that perhaps the highlight of the visit was the invitation extended by the Prime Minister, Mr. Hateyama, to dinner at the Fujiya Hotal at Miyaneshita. Mr. Hateyama, Mr. Kono, the Minister of Agriculture and Forestry, Ambassador Matsumoto, and Deputy Special Cabinet Secretary, Mr. F. Matsumoto, returned to Japan from Moscow on November 1st. The Prime Minister is, as you know, an invalid, and he went immediately to Miyanoshita for a week's rest prior to the opening of the forthcoming special session of the Diet on December 10. We were at nearby Kawana Hotel and the itinerary provided for our return to Tokyo therefrom on Monday morning, November 5. A telephone call from the Prime Minister's secretary asked if we could alter the itinerary and have dinner with Mr. Hateyama and his wife on Sunday evening, the 4th. Mr. Howe gladly accepted the invitation; the plans were changed and we arrived at the Fujiya Hotel approximately an hour before the dinner. We found that the other dinner guests were Mr. Kono, the two Matsumotos and Mr. Kishi, the man who I consider will be Mr. Hateyama's successor. We had a most enjoyable dinner and the opportunity of a chat with the Prime Minister and the other guests both before and after the meal. This function is an honour reserved for few, particularly in the light of the fact that all these men were busily engaged not only in preparation for the forthcoming Diet session, but also with the domestic political situation consequent upon the inevitable change of Prime Minister. That Mr. Hateyama and the others could take time out to extend this hospitality was something which I know Mr. Howe deeply appreciated, as did I.

9. On Wednesday morning we all attended at Mr. Kono's office. By separate despatch I will be sending you two memoranda I prepared of what transpired at this meeting.

10. Upon Mr. Howe's arrival, he was extended a very delightful dinner by Mr. Shigomitsu, the Foreign Minister, who at the time was Acting Prime Minister in the absence of Mr. Hateyama. He was also entertained by Mr. Takasaki, who was Acting Minister of Agriculture and Forestry in the absence of Mr. Kono. He was likewise entertained by the Minister of International Trade and Industry, Mr. Ishibashi, and by Mr. Masutani, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who recently visited Ottawa. He was entertained by others practically every night of his stay. I thought that Mr. Howe would be completely exhausted after this strenuous tour but when he boarded the plane on Wednesday night, he was infinitely more refreshed than when he arrived. His mind had been taken completely away from Canadian affairs and was engaged in absorbing the Japanese scene, which was completely foreign to anything he had ever experienced before. Perhaps the best bit of evidence of his complete relaxation occurred during our week-end visit at Kawana where, on the Sunday morning, Mr. Howe enjoyed 18 holes of golf over one of the two beautiful golf courses to be found there. After lunch we all retired for a nap and, shortly after two o'clock, I was awakened by the bed shaking, windows rattling, furniture moving about and the chandelier swinging. It was, I realized, an earthquake and I wondered if perhaps it had been arranged by Mr. Kono so that Mr. Howe would have every possible experience in this country. In any event, I later asked Mr. Howe what he thought of this experience and, to my amazement, learned he didn't even know that an earthquake had taken place.

11. I am sending a copy hereof to Mr. Pearson, and to the Prime Minister.

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures et du ministre de la Citoyenneté et de l'Immigration pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs and Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 63-56 Ottawa, February 23, 1956

PASSPORT FACILITIES FOR AND RETURN TO CANADA OF CANADIAN CITIZENS OF JAPANESE ORIGIN

In order to prevent the possible occurrence of untoward incidents caused by feelings aroused during the war against Japan, Cabinet directed in the early post-war period that certain precautions should be taken to control thè movement and return to Canada of Canadian citizens of Japanese origin.

These directives were modified from time to time as circumstances permitted. Today there are only two such directives remaining:

(a) a Cabinet directive of October 1, 1947 that passports should not, except in special circumstances, be issued or renewed to Canadian citizens of Japanese origin in Japan;

(b) a Cabinet directive of July 31, 1952 that passports for return to Canada could henceforth be issued to Canadian citizens of Japanese origin notwithstanding the fact that they had served in the enemy forces, it being understood that if an examination of his war record proved any such person to be clearly undesirable, every effort would be made to prevent his return to Canada.

In a Memorandum to Cabinet of March 5, 1953, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs recommended that natural-born Canadian citizens of Japanese race who had served in the enemy armed forces be dealt with on a basis similar to that obtaining for Canadian citizens of other races, and to this effect that passports be issued to Canadian citizens of Japanese race notwithstanding the fact that they had served in enemy forces. At its meeting on March 12, 1953, Cabinet deferred its decision on this recommendation.

It does not appear necessary or desirable to maintain any longer the special restrictions on Canadian citizens of Japanese origin mentioned above. No such restrictions are applied to Canadians of other racial or national origin, and the restrictions which existed against Canadians who had served in the German or Italian armed forces were lifted in October, 1949. Since Canadian-Japanese relations have now been restored to normal, it would seem inappropriate to continue in effect restrictions against Canadians of Japanese origin residing in Japan. The arguments for amending the Cabinet directives referred to above are outlined in greater detail in Appendix A, attached.

The undersigned, therefore, recommend

(a) that passports may be issued to Canadian citizens of Japanese origin, notwithstanding the fact that they served in the enemy armed forces, on a basis similar to that obtaining for Canadian citizens of other racial or national origins;

(b) that no distinction should be made with regard to the issuance or renewal of passports between Canadian citizens of Japanese origin and those of other racial or national origins.

Appendice A

Appendix A

SECRET Ottawa, February 23, 1956

PASSPORT FACILITIES FOR AND RETURN TO CANADA
OF CANADIAN CITIZENS OF JAPANESE ORIGIN

The special restrictions on Canadian citizens of Japanese origin established by the Cabinet directives of October 1, 1947 and July 31, 1952, appear to be no longer necessary or desirable for the following reasons:

(a) Ten years after Japan's surrender Canadian-Japanese relations have been restored to normal. Canada has concluded a number of agreements with Japan governing matters of mutual interest. Japan has become an important market for Canadian exports particularly cereals.

(b) Evidence of mistreatment obtained through full interrogation of Canadian prisoners-of-war resulted in the prosecution by Canadian Army law officers of a number of Japanese prison guards, etc. There was only one Japanese-Canadian in this lot — Inouye Kanao ("The Kamloops Kid") — who was convicted of high treason in Hong Kong in 1947 and hanged. Most major and minor Japanese war criminals, having served ten years of their sentences, have now been released. Public sentiment on this subject has subsided.

(c) Persons of Japanese origin in Canada have settled widely across the country and are being assimilated in their respective communities so far as may be expected. No untoward incidents have occurred; none need be expected.

(d) The Canadian Ambassador in Japan has pointed out that in restricting the issue of passports to Canadian citizens of Japanese origin in Japan only to persons having made definite reservations for travel to Canada in compliance with the Cabinet directive of October 1, 1947, the Embassy is:

(i) compelled to discriminate against Canadian citizens of Japanese origin compared with persons of other national origin; and

(ii) this works a hardship on those who have renounced their Japanese nationality and have only Canadian citizenship and who may wish to travel to some country other than Canada for business, family, or other reasons.

(e) Canadian citizens who served in the enemy armed forces who are of Japanese origin are treated less generously than those who are of German, Austrian, and Italian origin. At its meeting of October 11, 1949, Cabinet directed that persons who were Canadian citizens by birth and who had served in the enemy armed forces were to be issued with passports, and that persons who were Canadian citizens by naturalization were also to be issued with passports provided their Canadian citizenship status had not been revoked under the provisions of the Canadian Citizenship Act. When issuing the above instructions at that time, however, Cabinet directed that they should not be applied to Canadian citizens of Japanese origin. Hence Japanese-Canadians are still singled out for different treatment from that accorded to persons of European origin.

(f) The directive of July 31, 1952 on Canadians of Japanese origin can be circumvented in practice. Under the provisions of the Immigration Act, Canadian citizens are re-admissible to Canada as a matter of right; hence Japanese-Canadians can re-enter Canada without the necessity of applying for passports, by presenting themselves at the border and submitting proof of Canadian citizenship. Canadian law itself, therefore, provides the means to nullify the directive.

(g) Cabinet has already considerably eased immigration regulations as they apply to persons of Japanese origin. On January 22, 1954, Cabinet directed that the position of Japan with respect to immigration should not differ in principle from that of other Asian countries;[121] on [April 20], 1955 Cabinet granted authority for the admission of persons not coming within the admissible classes where strong humanitarian or compassionate grounds for admission existed.[122] Situations could arise where a Japanese citizen could enter Canada more easily as an immigrant than as a returning Canadian.

(h) It is now extremely difficult to obtain the proof required that an individual is clearly undesirable within the meaning of the Cabinet directive. The Canadian Embassy in Tokyo no longer can obtain the complete records of service in the Japanese Armed Forces which were available during the occupation period. It is, therefore, difficult to secure sufficient evidence to warrant the refusal of passport facilities, and this difficulty increases with the passage of time.[123]

INVITATION TO THE PRESIDENT OF INDONESIA TO VISIT CANADA

During his recent visit to Djakarta Mr. Dulles invited President Sukarno of Indonesia to visit the United States. The dates suggested were May 16 to 19 in Washington, with perhaps a further week for travel in the United States. We do not yet know officially that President Sukarno has accepted the invitation, but it would appear from press reports that he has.

2. You will recall that when you were in Djakarta in March, 1954 you made some casual reference to the possibility of President Sukarno visiting Canada. Later it was agreed that we would not extend a direct invitation unless and until the United States Government invited him to Washington. We therefore asked the United States authorities to inform us in advance of their plans in this regard, and it was as a result of this request that they informed us of the invitation extended recently by Mr. Dulles.

3. You may consider, therefore, that we should now invite him to spend a few days in Canada. Probably two days in Ottawa would be sufficient, although if he wished to spend more time in Canada arrangements might be made for him to pay short visits to other parts of the country. One possibility might be Arvida (Aluminium, Ltd. has bauxite interests in Indonesia); Niagara Falls might be another. As Dr. Sukarno is a Head of State, it would be appropriate for the Governor General to be his host in Ottawa.

4. Such a visit would, of course, repay Indonesia's hospitality to you and we might anticipate more positive advantages as well. There is no doubt that the good feeling engendered by such a visit would facilitate the work of our Ambassador in Indonesia. More important, if President Sukarno gains a favourable impression of North America, it would probably be a good influence on him. As you know, he is an ultra-nationalist, inclined to demagoguery, but with a wide personal influence in Indonesia. Anti-western elements there have been at pains to win his favour. He is no doubt the more susceptible to anti-western arguments because he has never visited a western country, and seems to have only a most imperfect understanding of western political and economic motives. For example, there is some risk at the present time that his personal influence, which is almost decisive in Indonesian politics, will be thrown in the direction of a Popular Front government with communist participation. The State Department is hopeful that if Dr. Sukarno comes to the United States some of his misapprehensions can be corrected. I agree that the possibility of influencing him to look with more favour on the West is an important consideration to be kept in mind, and that if he came to Canada, we should therefore ensure that there would be some time for political discussion and an opportunity for him to visit other parts of the country. In short, we might think in terms of a visit which would be something more than a strictly formal state occasion.

5. Assuming that President Sukarno accepts the United States invitation, do you agree that we might also invite him to visit Canada? From our present information it appears that his tour of the United States will end on May 26 or 27, in which case it could probably be arranged that he would arrive in Ottawa on Monday, May 28. I understand that the Governor General will be in Ottawa on that day and the day following, although he will also have as his guests at Government House Lord Home, Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations, and Lady Home. Subject to your approval of the invitation, we would, of course, consult the Governor General as soon as he could be reached in the Far North, and if the conflict of visits would be likely to create embarrassment, it might be possible to make some adjustment of timetables in consultation with the staff at Government House.[124]

QUESTION OF INVITATION FOR THE PRESIDENT OF INDONESIA TO ADDRESS PARLIAMENT

When this subject was first raised Mr. Cross indicated that the Prime Minister did not favour extending an invitation to President Sukarno to address Parliament. This information was conveyed to Mr. Heasman with the explanation that a number of previous proposals (e.g. President of Haiti) had been rejected.

2. Mr. Heasman has requested reconsideration and we thought that you should review the arguments which are outlined in the form of a possible memorandum for the Prime Minister in case you should decide to support reconsideration.

3. I understand you may have spoken again to the Prime Minister recently about this.[125]

Projet de note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le premier ministre

Draft Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Prime Minister

QUESTION OF INVITATION FOR THE PRESIDENT OF INDONESIA TO ADDRESS PARLIAMENT

The Canadian Ambassador in Indonesia has urged reconsideration of the discouraging reply we gave to the Indonesian request that President Sukarno be invited to address Parliament.

2. I fully realize that these special occasions are occurring too frequently and that every effort must be made to restrict them to the minimum. I think, however, that we should have another look at this particular case in the light of the good such an invitation would do our relations with Indonesia and the difficulty of conveying a convincing negative reply. Mr. Heasman has said that any explanation (such as restriction to Commonwealth and NATO) we offered for failing to invite Mr. Sukarno, who has indicated a desire to address Parliament, would not be understood by the President or by the Indonesians.

3. The principal arguments supporting an invitation would seem to be these:

(a) An invitation would be regarded as the highest honour Canada could pay the President of an important Asian nation, which has the fifth largest population in the world.

(b) He has been invited to address the U.S. Congress.

(c) In preparing a speech for Parliament, President Sukarno would probably make a special effort to put himself in the place of his Canadian listeners. This might have a salutary effect on an Asian revolutionary leader who has been given to thinking and speaking in rather narrow and at times shortsighted nationalistic terms.

(d) It might be of interest to Members of Parliament to hear the President of Indonesia speak since he represents a new independent Asian state to which we are giving assistance through the Colombo Plan and United Nations agencies.

4. The President's visit to the Houses of Parliament is now scheduled to take place on the afternoon of Tuesday, June 5. If an invitation to deliver an address were to be extended, it should presumably be for 2:30 that afternoon.

5. I realize that this presents another of these difficult cases. I thought, however, that I should review for you the considerations specifically relating to Indonesia. May I have your views, please.

YOUR DISCUSSIONS WITH THE INDONESIAN FOREIGN MINISTER — TALKING POINTS

To leave a favourable impression rather than to put across Canadian views is, I think, our chief objective in connection with the Indonesian state visit. As there will be no fixed private meeting between Mr. St. Laurent and Dr. Sukarno, your meeting with the Foreign Minister will be the only opportunity, other than social occasions, for an exchange of views.

2. If given an opportunity Mr. Abdulgani might be willing to give a short general review of the outlook of the new Indonesian Government. He did this in Washington at his meeting with Mr. Dulles, during which he particularly stressed Indonesia's desire to improve her relations with Japan and The Netherlands.

Dutch-Indonesian Relations

3. The most useful influence we could exert on Mr. Abdulgani would, I am sure, be to urge an improvement in Netherlands-Indonesian relations. These are at their lowest point in years, owing principally to an almost complete breakdown of normal diplomatic contact between The Hague and Djakarta. Indonesia recently annulled unilaterally the Round-Table Conference Agreements[126] and related agreements, thereby sweeping away the whole basis on which relations between the two countries had previously rested. Nothing has yet been worked out to take the place of these agreements. One result has been that the Netherlands High Commission in Djakarta is not now recognized by the Indonesian Government pending the negotiation of a new form of diplomatic relations, presumably an exchange of Embassies.

4. The triangular nature of Canada's relations with Indonesia and The Netherlands has become very evident in the last few months. There have, for example, been three recent Dutch requests for diplomatic support against the Indonesians: (a) during the Jungschlager trial; (b) with regard to the impending trials of three additional Dutchmen; and (c) with regard to the non-payment of interest on a bond issue for which the Djakarta Government assumed responsibility at the time of the Transfer of Sovereignty. We have responded only to (b). All of them, however, were somewhat embarrassing in that they involved us directly in what are plainly bilateral matters.

5. The point might be made to Mr. Abdulgani that while it was only to be expected that Dutch-Indonesian hostility would persist for some time after the Transfer of Sovereignty, we regret that two nations which we count among our close friends have not been able to patch up their difficulties after five years. We know the Dutch very well and would concede that their approach is sometimes unduly legalistic. However, we would be confident that, given a reasonable opportunity to protect their essential economic interests in Indonesia, the Dutch would be willing to forget past differences. It would be our hope that the new Indonesian Government will approach the problem of its relations with the Netherlands with this in mind and in a spirit of moderation.

Imprisoned Dutch Nationals in Indonesia[127]

6. You have indicated that, if a suitable opportunity arises, you might mention this question to the Foreign Minister. Our position is that the trials are a domestic Indonesian affair and that the legality or otherwise of the charges brought against the prisoners is none of our concern. However, as Mr. Dulles put it in Washington, "a magnanimous attitude (on the part of the Indonesians) would be an act of considerable statesmanship". This is probably the best line to take. You will recall that our instructions to Mr. Heasman in Djakarta asked him to emphasize the damage which is done to East-West relations generally by the excessive publicity which these trials have received.

West New Guinea

7. It is probably inevitable that Mr. Abdulgani will mention this question, possibly to request our support. There is, I think, little that can usefully be said about it, except perhaps to deplore the existence of the dispute and to restate our traditional view that it is primarily legal in nature and therefore a matter more appropriate for the International Court of Justice than for the General Assembly. We are aware that a solution will be difficult to find but we would frankly question the utility of keeping the matter before the United Nations. While we believe that the General Assembly probably has a right to discuss the matter, the inevitable result of such discussion is that firm lines tend to get drawn and attitudes to harden. We were therefore quite pleased that at the last Assembly the Indonesians were able to accept a mild resolution which simply noted that bilateral negotiations between the Netherlands and Indonesia were about to commence, and, without mentioning New Guinea, expressed the hope that these negotiations would be fruitful. This resolution was passed without discussion, objection or vote. In the event, the negotiations broke down, although not specifically because of the New Guinea dispute. You may wish to ask Mr. Abdulgani whether he considers that it will be possible (as we hope) for the two parties directly concerned to make further progress without the United Nations again becoming involved.

8. As you will have seen from a recent telegram, the Australian Ministry of External Affairs have expressed to our High Commissioner some concern regarding President Sukarno's statements on West New Guinea while he was in the United States. They hope that he will not be given any encouragement on this particular question while in Canada.

SEATO, Neutralism, etc.

9. A suitable expression of our attitude towards the neutralist Asian bloc, of which Indonesia is a leading member, would possibly go down well with Mr. Abdulgani. While we are associated in various ways with other countries which are members of SEATO, we have no immediate strategic commitments in Southeast Asia. Moreover, we recognize that strong views on the undesirability of military pacts can legitimately be held, and we would want Indonesians to know that we respect and seek to understand their independent foreign policy. Perhaps the best illustration of Canada's approach to neutralism and independence is the closeness of our bonds with India. The fact that India also dislikes SEATO has not prevented the closest co-operation with her within the Commonwealth, under the Colombo Plan, and in numerous other ways. The thought might be left with Mr. Abdulgani that we see no obstacles to the similar development of Canadian-Indonesian relations.

10. Perhaps you might also mention that we consider our role in Indochina as a contribution to the stability of the Southeast Asian area.

Colombo Plan

11. You might wish to mention our satisfaction with the arrangements made last year to bring ten Indonesian students to Canada for training in engineering at the undergraduate level. One of these students led his class at Nova Scotia Technical College. Most of the others are also doing very well. The Indonesians have accepted our offer to take fifteen more undergraduate students in the engineering field this year. The team which we sent to Indonesia to investigate the possibility of our assisting in staffing and equipping technical training institutions out there has now returned and its report is being considered. As you will remember, Dr. Monture and Dr. Cameron were the members of this team. Another Technical Assistance project which Dr. Ault of the Civil Service Commission has been exploring with the U.N. Technical Assistance authorities is a possible arrangement for providing training in public administration in Indonesia. The only capital project which we have under active consideration at present is a proposal for an aerial survey of Indonesia's resources. We have received and discussed the report of the Canadian expert who looked into this project and we are hopeful that after further discussions with the Indonesians (having to do with the uses to which the results of the survey would be put and certain technical details affecting the carrying out of the survey) we shall be able to recommend this project to Cabinet. It might cost anywhere between $1 million and $2 1/2 million spread over two year or so.

12. Some biographical notes on Mr. Abdulgani appear on page 2 of the attached paper.† Washington's telegram† on the political discussions there is also attached in case you would like to review it.

RESTRICTED [Ottawa], June 6, 1956

INTERVIEW BETWEEN MR. PEARSON AND THE INDONESIAN FOREIGN MINISTER, MR. ABDULGANI

The Indonesian Foreign Minister, accompanied by Mr. Sastroamidjojo, the Indonesian Ambassador, called on Mr. Pearson in his office in the House of Commons at 3:15 p.m. on June 5. Mr. Menzies was also present.

2. Mr. Abdulgani said that following the first general elections, and the creation of a coalition Cabinet representing a substantial majority of the members of Parliament, it was hoped that there would be a stable government in Indonesia for several years. He thought that this stability would be helpful in enabling Indonesia to get on with the programme of national development. In order to keep the Communist party, which was in Parliamentary opposition, from making headway it was necessary to offer the people a programme of economic and social development. Mr. Abdulgani said that assistance from abroad could be helpful in this respect and he referred particularly to the Colombo Plan.

3. Mr. Pearson said that we were glad to have been able to give some modest assistance to Indonesia through the Colombo Plan and that we were looking into ways of making some further contributions. He mentioned that Canada had had a successful experience in carrying on aerial surveys in Pakistan and Ceylon and that we were now looking into the possibility of giving similar assistance to Indonesia. He also spoke of the fact that we have about 15 Indonesian students studying in Canada today. One of these had led his class at Nova Scotia Technical Institute. Mr. Pearson said that he hoped we would be able to substantially increase the number of Indonesian students in Canada next year.

4. Mr. Abdulgani said that the possibility of more Indonesian students coming to Canada appealed to him. They had a very large number of students attending universities in the Netherlands. They wished to re-distribute their overseas student population and it was increasingly desirable to send students to English-speaking countries. A number of the Indonesian students had mentioned that Canada was a quieter country than the United States and he thought that this would be conducive to better scholastic application.

5. Mr. Abdulgani said that Indonesia had two major problems in her foreign relations: one with Japan and the other with the Netherlands. He thought it might take a number of years to settle their relations with these two countries as there was a legacy of a good deal of bitterness in Indonesia. He hoped, however, that the new and more stable Indonesian Government could make a good start in tackling these two problems.

6. With regard to Japan, Mr. Abdulgani noted that the conclusion of reparations settlements between Japan and Burma and Japan and The Philippines would enable an early start to be made on their own negotiations with Japan.

7. In regard to the Netherlands, Mr. Abdulgani referred to the fact that the new Parliament had recently ratified bills relating to the dissolution of the Netherlands-Indonesian Union and the various Round Table Agreements. He said that he had asked the Parliament to give him some latitude for negotiating a new relationship with the Netherlands. He said that Indonesia could not afford the foreign exchange to continue to give Netherlands interests special privileges in the matter of repatriation of profits and capital. They would have to accept a position similar to that of other foreign interests in Indonesia. He also referred to the difficulty they were having in paying pensions to former officials of the Netherlands-Indies administration. Mr. Abdulgani said that he had initiated some informal conversations with the Netherlands Government but did not volunteer further information as to the direction these talks might be expected to take.

8. Mr. Abdulgani also referred to the problem of West New Guinea and said that he was considering whether or not to place this subject on the agenda of the next session of the General Assembly. He said that the continuation of Netherlands control of West New Guinea aroused strong feelings in Indonesia. There had been one representative from West New Guinea in the old Parliament and he thought there would be three in the new Parliament. There was a bill before Parliament to create a province out of West New Guinea. He said that the presence of Netherlands forces in West New Guinea also created a security problem for Indonesia.

9. Mr. Pearson asked whether the Indonesians would be satisfied if the Dutch were to withdraw from West New Guinea without that territory actually becoming a part of Indonesia. Mr. Abdulgani said that West New Guinea had been historically under the control of the Sultan of Ternate in the East Moluccas. Furthermore, West New Guinea had been historically a part of the Netherlands-Indies. He thought it was essential therefore that it be reunited with Indonesia. Mr. Pearson asked whether the Indonesians would be concerned about the future of East New Guinea. Mr. Abdulgani said that Indonesian influences had never extended to East New Guinea and that the future of that territory was not their concern but that of Australia.

10. Mr. Pearson then asked about British North Borneo, Brunei and Sarawak. Mr. Abdulgani said that these territories had not been historically part of the various Indonesian Empires. They had always been under the influence of northern maritime Empires based in Indochina. Indonesia had no ambitions to absorb these territories. Mr. Abdulgani said that some Filipinos had speculated about the possibility of eventually creating a Greater Malayan Federation. These Filipinos said that the Philippines was the first Malayan Republic; Indonesia the second; Malaya would be the third and eventually all of these might be federated to form a Greater Malayan Federation with a population of 125,000,000. Mr. Abdulgani commented that this was a project for future generations. Their own eyes were focused only on the emancipation of all Indonesian territory and the consolidation of their state.

11. Mr. Abdulgani extended an invitation to Mr. and Mrs. Pearson to visit Indonesia if Mr. Pearson should attend the next meeting of the Colombo Plan in New Zealand this autumn. Mr. Pearson said that he could not now be sure that he would be able to attend the next meeting of the Colombo Plan as he might be caught up in the work of the United Nations and the NATO Committee of Three. He would, however, look forward to paying a good visit to Indonesia one day.

12. Mr. Pearson said that the Department of External Affairs would be arranging to send a gift of 100 books on Canada to the Indonesian National University.

13. The interview ended with mutual expressions of goodwill and understanding. It was evident throughout that the Indonesian Foreign Minister felt at ease and free to express his views quite frankly.

Le chef de la Direction de l'Extrême-Orient à l'ambassadeur en Indonésie

Head, Far Eastern Division, to Ambassador in Indonesia

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, June 15, 1956

Dear George [Heasman],

We had hoped to have prepared for the bag leaving today a rather complete "round-up" on President Sukarno's visit, but unfortunately it is not yet ready. In what little time remains, however, I shall put down some of my own impressions — for the most part undigested impressions, I am afraid — for your preliminary information.

I am quite sure now that the visit will have to be rated a success by any standard. As we mentioned in our telegram of June 7,† interest among the public and press seemed a little small during the first two days in Ottawa, but this was mainly due to the counter-attraction of the pipeline debate in the House, which was then at its zenith. This situation rapidly improved during the last part of the visit as Sukarno's personality began leaving its impact, and there was a large volume of editorial comment almost unanimously favourable to the President and his point of view. We shall be sending you a sheaf of samples of it in due course.

You will have gathered by now that the President's address to both Houses of Parliament was a full-dress affair in all respects similar to President Gronchi's address and those by other Heads of State. In other words, the President was introduced by the Prime Minister, thanked by both Speakers, and his remarks were printed in Hansard.[128] It was quite an impressive occasion and there is no doubt that Sukarno made quite an impact on his audience. Throughout the visit here and in the United States he concentrated pretty much to the exclusion of everything else on the themes of nationalism and anti-colonialism. By his forthrightness and bluntness he managed to arouse new interest in these rather hackneyed themes.

The visit as a whole was uneventful in that there were no untoward incidents or any real business done. Whether Sukarno has been influenced in his personal views to any considerable extent, I would not care to guess. He was very careful to avoid references to Indonesia's position as between East and West, except to stress his independence of the two power blocs. At no time did he express personal or official views on the relative merits of Communism and Capitalism, or give any indication as to how he personally felt on the subject. It may very well be that he was anxious not to compromise his freedom of action when he visits the Soviet Union later this year. I really think that we shall have to study and assess the results of that visit before attempting to form an opinion as to how Sukarno's travels have affected him.

The whole party were, of course, pretty tired by the time they arrived in Canada, but they managed to remain cheerful and friendly throughout their rather crowded itinerary. In fact, they were as pleasant a group as one could wish to entertain. The Service Officers were given a lunch by the Chief of Staff in Ottawa and the Chief Justice spent an hour or so with Chief Justice Kerwin. You already have a record of Mr. Abdulgani's talk with the Minister, which unfortunately took place at a very busy time for Mr. Pearson and had to be limited to about half an hour. With regard to other members of the party, D'Arcy McGreer and I and others who saw something of them hope to put together some "personality" notes which may be of assistance to you.

By next week, I hope to be able to send a much more complete account.†

Yours sincerely,

A.R. MENZIES

POSSIBLE SALE OF F-86 AIRCRAFT TO COLOMBIA

Two Canadian firms have recently been in contact with Colombian authorities in connection with possible contracts. One firm is Canadair, which hopes to sell F-86 aircraft; the other is Canadian Aviation Electronics, which hopes to obtain a contract to direct the installation and operation of an air navigation and control system. The CAE proposal would not involve classified information or material, is regarded by Defence Production as a satisfactory plan, and would not appear to involve the Government in any way. This information was given informally to the General Manager of CAE, who called last week to find out why government departments appeared to see a connection between his Company's proposal and the Canadair scheme.

2. The reason for the connection is that the first word received by this Department of either of these matters came in the form of a letter† followed by telegrams† from our Embassy in Bogota, and as far as the Embassy was concerned the two matters were related. The relationship arose because both firms are seeking to arrange a visit to Canada by a technical team to discuss their plans further. It is, apparently, a possibility that a single team might wish to come to Canada to look into both matters. The Embassy, with a view to the substantial contracts which might result, has recommended that the Government should issue or endorse an invitation for a Colombian Air Force team to make such a visit.

3. The Department of Defence Production would welcome a sale of F-86 aircraft to the Colombian Air Force. It would appear that perhaps one squadron might be involved; this would presumably mean about two dozen aircraft worth perhaps $8 million. The Department of Trade and Commerce in general endorses Defence Production's view, but points out that the Government should give no encouragement to a visit by a technical team which might discuss the purchase of F-86 aircraft unless the Government has previously determined that it will probably be willing to release such aircraft. The Department of National Defence is also involved, since Canadair's plan calls for the team to visit RCAF installations in order to see demonstrations of the aircraft in operation. National Defence's position is that they would be quite willing to have a technical team visit some of their installations in order to see F-86 aircraft on the ground and in flight, but that they would not be willing, at least without careful consideration, to have a Colombian Air Force team visit air defence headquarters and learn any details of RCAF arrangements for the operation of an air defence system using these aircraft.

4. Some indication of these views was given to the representative of CAE who called last week, and he drew the obvious conclusion that his firm might be well advised to invite a Colombian team to come to Canada for the sole purpose of discussing the possible CAE contract without reference to the possible purchase of F-86's or to any visit to Government establishments.

5. We understand that Mr. Howe wishes to have an official invitation issued for a Colombian Air Force team to come to Canada to discuss the purchase of F-86 aircraft with Canadair and, at the same time, to see whatever demonstrations of these aircraft the RCAF is prepared to provide. He would wish to see this done because he believes that the Government should be prepared to release the aircraft if the Colombians are willing to purchase. We understand he is likely to speak to you about this matter in the near future.

6. For our own part, we are doubtful whether it would be advisable to release such aircraft to Colombia at the present time and therefore whether it would be appropriate for the Government to take any part in arranging for a visit which might lead to such a result. Canada has not yet provided swept-wing jet aircraft to any country other than members of NATO or the Commonwealth. In addition, the size of the proposed sale would be out of all proportion to the volume of business in military items which Canada has carried on with Latin American countries in the past. The deal would thus constitute a precedent, both in terms of the type of item supplied and in terms of the dollar value. We are seeking to obtain information from the Joint Intelligence Bureau on the availability of similar aircraft to Latin American countries in general and, if it should appear that such aircraft are in fact available from the United States, United Kingdom or other sources to a number of Latin American countries, it might be that the matter should be reconsidered. At least until such information is forthcoming, however, we would recommend that such aircraft be not released to Colombia and that the Government should not endorse an invitation to the Colombian Air Force to send a technical team to Canada to investigate the possibility of buying. It would follow that we should discourage Canadair from inviting such a visit on their own responsibility, since a visit of this nature, even under Canadair's private auspices, would probably be taken to imply that the Government would not object to a sale.[1]

SALE OF F86S TO COLOMBIA

We agreed to draft a joint submission to Cabinet on behalf of Canadair as soon as we received a formal application for an export permit. The application is now in hand.

[1] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
We should have a report on conditions in Colombia; also, inquire of US, UK about their policy re such orders before we make any decision here. L.B. P[earson]

As I see it, the division of responsibility between the different branches is as follows. External Affairs will handle the political aspects, Department of Defence Production the production and Department of Trade and Commerce commercial relations.

We have obtained Department of Defence Production's views and they would like the following paragraphs included in the memorandum to Cabinet.

"The Department of Defence Production welcomes this order for additional F-86 aircraft as a means of reducing Canadair's overall cost of production of similar aircraft for the RCAF.

The purchase of this aircraft by Colombia may stimulate sales to other parts of the world, and will certainly result in continuing spares business for Canadair which, in turn, reduces the cost of all production for Canadian Government account."

We, in Trade and Commerce, are keenly interested in this matter, and are under instruction to support Canadair's efforts to find export markets in a manner which would not infer and would not be interpreted as indicating prior approval by the Canadian Government. We feel that this business is important to Canadian commercial relations with Colombia.

Canadair has negotiated a contract with the Colombian Government to establish in that country overhaul and service facilities for jet aircraft. This deal involves management and supervision and training of personnel and will call for the services of over 100 of their own technicians in Colombia for a period of two to three years. This contract is not related to the sale of Sabre jets as these facilities are presently needed to service T-33 jet trainers purchased from United States sources which are now in use by the Colombian Air Force. These services would also be used to service any new jet aircraft.

From the foregoing, I think it can be clearly seen that the fact that over 100 Canadian personnel will be employed in Colombia for these servicing facilities would suggest that a large quantity of Canadian equipment will find its way into Colombia through these channels. If the Colombian Government were to obtain the Sabre jets undoubtedly there would be a much larger flow of Canadian equipment into Colombia in the form of replacement parts. Obviously, the Colombian Government will need more aircraft from time to time as six units would hardly be sufficient planes for the Colombian Air Force.

In addition to the foregoing, there is also the possibility that a Canadian firm may be given the opportunity to quote on radio beacon stations and telecommunication equipment which is urgently required in Colombia, not only for military aircraft purposes, but also for commercial aircraft needs. This in itself would constitute a substantial contract and by and large we feel that these projects would bring Canada's name to the attention of the Colombian people in such a way that we would expect our commercial connections with Colombia to be considerably improved.

POSSIBLE SALE TO COLOMBIA OF F-86 AIRCRAFT

Yesterday Mr. Harvey and Mr. Thorne of your Department discussed this matter with Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Kirkwood of this Department. Mr. Harvey referred to the various arguments, with which you are already familiar, in favour of the proposed sale, and left with us some notes summarizing these arguments as assessed by officials of your Department and of the Department of Defence Production. Mr. Ritchie in turn referred to considerations which would suggest that we should proceed cautiously. These considerations were developed in two memoranda† prepared in this Department, and I might outline them briefly here.

The first memorandum examined the general political considerations relating to the sale of modern jet military aircraft to South American countries. Briefly it would appear that such sales would involve a significant precedent for Canada, since the role of supplier of military equipment of this nature to areas like Latin America has traditionally been filled by the great powers.[2] The United States, moreover, is bound to the various Latin American countries by the Rio Treaty to which we are not a party. Our sales of such aircraft to date have been within the special relationships created by membership in NATO and the Commonwealth.

Most Latin American governments are military dictatorships, and to bolster these régimes by the provision of expensive military equipment (for which the countries concerned must sacrifice resources which might in their own interest be better employed for constructive social purposes) would tend to alienate in those countries the liberal and progressive forces with which Canadian opinion is disposed to be sympathetic. Such activities would contrast with our Colombo Plan role in South East Asia,[3] and might open us to the attacks of Latin America's not insignificant Communist propagandists. Finally, it is questionable whether the provision of modern weapons to South American countries would in fact serve to increase in any significant way the effective military strength of the free world.

The second memorandum analyzes recent political trends within Colombia. The present régime, following its accession to power, initially provided effective and progressive government and commanded substantial popular support. In June of 1954, however, through stupidity and bad luck soldiers fired on an unarmed student parade, a number of civilians were killed, and many more injured. Popular opinion turned against the government, and it has maintained itself in power only through the exercise of increasingly repressive measures backed solely by armed force. The régime is now thoroughly unpopular, and while there is no immediate prospect of its overthrow, it clearly is in form and substance a military dictatorship of an unpleasant type. It has no present quarrel with its neighbours, but the possibility cannot be excluded that the régime may be driven to seek a military adventure to distract attention from its unpopularity and to avoid the risk of more serious disaffection.

We appreciate fully the arguments in favour of the proposed sale, and we consider them valid as far as they go. I have thought it useful to set out these other considerations, however, in order to explain why it would be difficult for us to join at present in recommending to Ministers that the sale be approved. We have asked the Joint Intelligence Bureau to provide an assessment of the military aspects of the matter, and I would suggest that it should be discussed again when that opinion is available. In the meantime, I hope you agree that it would be premature to frame a recommendation to Ministers.

Dear Mr. Léger,

POSSIBLE SALE OF F-86 AIRCRAFT TO COLOMBIA

I am grateful to you for putting on paper the reasons why you would have difficulty at the present time in joining in a recommendation to Ministers that the sale of these aircraft be approved. In view of the urgency of the matter, I have reported to my Minister the reasons for your concern.

We anticipate, perhaps incorrectly, that the report by J.I.B. will point to the fact that other governments in Latin America have been supplied with these aircraft and that these same planes have been freely offered to Colombia by the United States.

I appreciate the considerations which you must have in mind in studying what should be your own conclusions. I would like to point out, however, that there has been no previous warning of the position which you are now taking. It had been our understanding that this was a safe area in which to develop the type of business which is so important to our own developing aircraft industry. I am afraid that things have reached the point where we may face some real embarrassment if a decision is reached which will compel the manufacturer to withdraw the offer against which we understand he already has a letter of intent to purchase from the Colombian Government

Yours faithfully,

EXPORT OF ARMS; PURCHASE OF F86 AIRCRAFT BY COLOMBIA

24. The Secretary of State for External Affairs reported that Colombia wished to buy some F86 Sabre aircraft from Canadair. This was the first large order from a non-Commonwealth, non-N.A.T.O. country. It would be difficult to refuse to sell to a country which wished to develop its legitimate defences and which was in an area of the world where there was no tension at the moment. Another consideration of importance was the maintenance of the Canadian aircraft industry. Nevertheless he could foresee criticism if the order were filled.

25. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the request of Colombia to buy F86 aircraft, and deferred decision on the request and on the questions of general policy to which it gave rise.

PROPOSED EXPORT OF F-86 AIRCRAFT TO COLOMBIA

Canadair Limited has obtained an order to sell six F-86 aircraft to the Colombian Air Force. It is for decision whether an export permit should be issued to allow this transaction to proceed.

This order for F-86 aircraft has been welcomed as a means of reducing Canadair's overall cost of production of similar aircraft for the R.C.A.F. The purchase of this aircraft by Colombia may stimulate sales to other parts of the world, and will certainly result in continuing spares business for Canadair which, in turn, will reduce the cost of production for Canadian Government account.

This transaction, and others to be mentioned, might be expected to lead to a considerable improvement in Canada's general commercial relations with Colombia. Transactions which are related to this one but not dependent on it include a contract which Canadair has negotiated with the Colombian Government to establish in that country overhaul and service facilities for jet aircraft. This would include management, and supervision and training of personnel, on a scale calling for the services in Colombia for two or three years of more than one hundred Canadair Technicians. The facilities to be established are required in any case for T-33 jet trainers already owned by Colombia, but the magnitude of the transaction would undoubtedly be increased if the Colombian Air Force should obtain Canadian built F-86 orders, since six of these aircraft would hardly be sufficient over any length of time for the requirements of the Colombian Air Force. Finally, another Canadian firm (Canadian Aviation Electronics) may obtain a contract for installing and operating in Colombia an aeronautical control system involving radio beacons and telecommunications equipment for the use of civil as well as military aircraft. As Colombia is a central point for South American air traffic there are obvious commercial advantages in having Canadian firms obtain contracts from the Colombian Government in this general field.

There have been certain misgivings in connection with the proposed sale of F-86's to Colombia. It would constitute a precedent, in that we have not so far provided such aircraft for countries outside NATO and the Commonwealth. The present régime in Colombia is a somewhat unpopular military dictatorship, and there are political disadvantages in providing powerful and modern military equipment to such governments. Nevertheless it appears that similar aircraft are available from other sources to neighbouring South American countries, and there is little doubt that Colombia will obtain the aircraft it wants from another supplier if Canada does not release them. While the régime is not exemplary, it appears to be reasonably stable and Colombia has no history of dispute with neighbouring countries.

There are no military objections to the proposed sale, and it would appear to have little or no bearing on the possible sale of jet fighters to NATO countries such as Belgium or Germany where a different range of considerations applies.[4] Our recent sale of such aircraft to South Africa has already established a certain precedent to which countries such as India might refer in pressing a request, it does not appear that our freedom to accept or reject future requests on their merits would be further affected in any significant way by a sale now to Colombia.

Taking account of these various factors, I recommend that approval be given for the issue of an export permit for the export by Canadair of six F-86 aircraft to Colombia.

EXPORT OF ARMS; PROPOSED SALE OF AIRCRAFT TO COLOMBIA
(PREVIOUS REFERENCE MARCH 15)

30. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that Canadair Limited had now obtained an order to sell six F-86 aircraft to the Colombian Air Force. This sale would reduce the overall cost of production of similar aircraft for the R.C.A.F. It might be expected to lead to considerable improvement in Canada's general commercial relations with Colombia. There were no military objections and the sale appeared to have little or no bearing on the possible sale of jet fighters to N.A.T.O. countries. Moreover, it was likely that Colombia could get equivalent aircraft elsewhere.

The Minister recommended that an export permit be issued to allow this transaction to proceed.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, March 20, 1956 Cab. Doc. 75-56).

31. During the course of discussion the following points emerged:

(a) Although Colombia was not a democratic country, it did not appear to have any aggressive aims at the moment. That country was the best friend that Canada had in South America and it would be difficult to explain why the export of the aircraft could not be permitted.

(b) If the export permit were refused, the government would probably have to take the same position with respect to export of military equipment to any other country in South America. On the other hand, if a similar request were received from India, it would probably be accepted on the ground that this was a Commonwealth country, although the danger of an aggression in that area was greater than in South America.

(c) If the order were accepted, it might stimulate sales in other countries and strengthen the Canadian aircraft industry.

32. The Cabinet noted the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the proposed sale by Canadair Limited of six F-86 aircraft to the Colombian Air Force, and agreed that an export permit be issued to authorize the transaction.

EXPORT OF MILITARY JET AIRCRAFT TO LATIN AMERICAN COUNTRIES

Enclosed is a memorandum prepared in the Department on the export of military jet aircraft to Latin American countries. Our object in drafting this paper was partly to clear our own minds on the political implications of such exports, and partly to elicit views on the special conditions which may prevail in various countries. We would appreciate your comments on the application to Argentina of the factors elaborated in the memorandum, and any additional points you think pertinent to the discussion. EXPORT OF MILITARY JET AIRCRAFT TO COUNTRIES OF LATIN AMERICA

The export of Canadian jet aircraft has been the subject of a great deal of consideration by the Government and in Parliament in recent months. The main issue has, of course, been the application of the Israeli Government to buy twenty-four F-86 aircraft.[5] Other questions with which the Government has dealt have been the proposed export of CF-100 aircraft to Belgium, the supply to West Germany of F-86 aircraft, both under mutual aid and subsequently by commercial sale, and a sale of F-86 aircraft to Colombia. The sale to Colombia was approved and the aircraft were delivered in the early summer.

[5] Voir volume 22, chapitre premier, section C.
See Volume 22, Chapter I, Section C.

2. The Chief of Staff of the Venezuelan Air Force has recently visited Canada as a guest of AVRO. He was also a guest of the RCAF for a day or two. AVRO have organized the visit of a group of representatives to Bogota, Caracas, Rio de Janeiro, Buenos Aires and Lima next November, to promote the sales of CF-100 aircraft. This visit is the subject of letter No. E-169† of August 8 to Bogota, of which copies were sent to the other interested missions. In letter No. E-169, the missions concerned were informed that there was no objection in principle to the sale of these aircraft and that therefore they should give the AVRO representatives every proper assistance. At the same time, the missions should make clear that the Canadian Government was not officially promoting the sales of CF-100 aircraft, but that it was benevolently neutral. The letter went on to describe the security difficulties in the sale of CF-100's, in that certain parts of the equipment are of United States design and permission would have to be obtained from the United States authorities for the release of these aircraft. This security difficulty was given as the principal reason for a cautious attitude toward the sales effort of the AVRO representatives.

3. The Ambassador in Caracas has suggested that there should be a good will flight of three CF-100's to Venezuela and other countries in Latin America in December 1956. The genesis of this idea was that such a flight would be very good general publicity for Canada and for Canadian industry, in view of the impression made by the CF-100 at the Farnborough air show in September 1955. However, in view of the visit of the AVRO representatives to Latin America next November, the flight would obviously be directly linked to their efforts to sell these aircraft.

4. The sale of Canadian jet aircraft to countries outside the Commonwealth and NATO is a new development. The first sale in Latin America was the recent one to Colombia, although on a previous occasion a sale was approved by the Government but not completed. The emergence of Canada as a supplier of jet aircraft in Latin America is an important political and commercial development. It is particularly important that this department should ensure that the political implications are given due weight. The Government's view is that there is no objection in principle to the sale of jet aircraft to the countries of Latin America, but that any particular proposal should be the subject of a specific decision. As proposed sales may be submitted for Government approval within the next few months, it seems desirable to set out some of the considerations which might influence a Government decision on them. Accordingly, this memorandum has been prepared for circulation to various interested missions, so that when considering the sale of jet aircraft to a given country, the Department may have the views of the missions and an up-to-date report on local circumstances. It is also expected that some of the heads of mission may want to offer some general observations on this subject.

5. In the first place, such sales are of great importance to the health of the Canadian jet aircraft industry. The domestic Canadian requirement is not likely to be sufficient to maintain this industry on an economic basis. The design and bringing into production of modern aircraft is very costly and a substantial volume of production is necessary before it is worthwhile. The limited Canadian demand can, of course, be supplemented by giving away aircraft, for example, as NATO mutual aid, but this produces no direct economic return and does not offset the cost to Canada. The sale of a moderate number of our aircraft to foreign countries would make it far easier to maintain the industry as an up-to-date production facility. In particular it would assist in carrying it over the transition period between the fulfilment of Canadian requirements for a particular aircraft and the coming into production of its successor, a period which now involves problems of unemployment and loss of skilled personnel. The industry, in other words, now tends to operate on a cycle tied to each new type of aircraft and the development of foreign markets (especially in less advanced countries where aircraft which have become obsolescent by Canadian standards would still be in demand) would be most valuable in helping to smooth out the peaks and valleys of the cyclical process.

6. In the second place, it is obviously desirable that we should seek to sell abroad first-rate Canadian industrial products such as jet aircraft. Such sales are of commercial advantage and also enhance our standing in foreign countries. In some countries of Latin America, moreover, there seem to be few possibilities of expanding trade in other directions, but there may be a real possibility of obtaining Canadian sales of jet aircraft. This is particularly the case in a country such as Venezuela, where the balance of trade is strongly adverse to Canada. Moreover, the United Kingdom and the United States are now very much engaged in the export of jet aircraft to Latin America and various Latin American governments are anxious to buy more aircraft. This, therefore, is a legitimate trade and if we do not supply the aircraft, other countries, including even the Soviet Union, will do so. Jet aircraft, incidentally, are one of the few costly and complicated engineering products in the sale of which we can compete with the United Kingdom and the United States.

7. Our new role as a supplier of jet aircraft for Latin America is in keeping with our increase in international importance and military strength. Continued sales of jet aircraft will increase our influence in the area and enhance respect for Canada.

8. There are various arguments which might be advanced against the sale of jet aircraft in a particular case. In the first place, there are a number of traditional animosities and rivalries between the countries of Latin America and in the past these have resulted in local wars. The supply of modern arms tends to encourage these rivalries and, in some cases, might be a contributing factor to the outbreak of war. The primary responsibility for avoiding international tension rests, of course, with the countries themselves and with the Organization of American States, or possibly with the United Nations. The disarmament efforts of the United Nations may in time have some bearing on this question.

9. It is also true that the prompt attention given by the Inter-American Peace Committee of the OAS to the several appeals made to it in recent years by countries that were attacked or deemed themselves attacked, appears to have had a salutary effect, the attendant publicity being in itself, no doubt, a powerful deterrent to dictators who might be considering aggression. There has been nothing more than occasional border incidents since the tragic Bolivia-Paraguay war ended in 1935. Nevertheless, Latin American tempers are quick and their pride is sensitive; the possibility of a resort to arms always exists.

10. The countries which supply jet aircraft — the United States, the United Kingdom, and now Canada — bear some responsibility in the matter, particularly for ensuring that their methods of competition for sales do not exacerbate tensions between countries and prevent efforts which might be made to resolve differences. It would obviously be undesirable that we should develop anything like a vested interest in competitive armaments programmes of various military dictatorships. It may be appropriate, in certain circumstances, for the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada to consult about the shipment of aircraft to some countries, as has been done in the case of the Middle East. It might be desirable in some cases to reach an understanding for limiting sales or for dividing sales between potential suppliers. In any event, the implications of Canadian aircraft sales in this setting should be well thought out.

11. Jet aircraft may be used to suppress revolts. Revolts are, of course, a familiar feature of the Latin American scene and are often the appropriate way to get rid of an unsuitable government. The jet aircraft is not designed for use against rebels, but even though it is not tactically suitable it might have a very impressive effect upon them. If Canadian aircraft were used in this way, it might possibly lead to some bitterness and ill will toward Canada. At the same time, it is realized that Canadian aircraft might be used to bring a better government to power or to hold the best one there.

12. More than one dictator-president holds his power today only through the control exercised by the armed forces; if such a régime becomes so hated by the people as a whole that they revolt, or would revolt if they could, the salesman of arms is always in the unfortunate position that his customer is the oppressor. His sale of arms has strengthened the power of the dictator and, if this is known by the people, he may share the odium. Missions may be able to indicate if jet aircraft have been used to suppress or assist local rebellions, and if this has resulted in hostility toward the country supplying the aircraft.

13. It is quite possible in a more general way that the supply of jet aircraft could be portrayed by opponents of the different régimes as constituting support for the régimes from abroad. There does seem to be an opportunity here for good communist propaganda. The various military dictatorships could be portrayed as putting down the common people with weapons supplied by foreign capitalist governments, in contrast to the programmes of welfare which would be inaugurated if a communist-supported government came into power. Admittedly, Soviet sales of aircraft to Egypt could be used in rebuttal, but communist propaganda would make its mark in the limited Latin American setting before replies became effective.

14. It is doubtful whether the furnishing of jet aircraft to Latin American countries adds anything of consequence to the military strength of the western powers. It may be that some countries such as Venezuela might perform a useful local role in the event of a general war and the presence of military missions in several countries may imply a more favourable opinion by the United States, but the experience of World War II indicates that the armed forces — and particularly a highly technical arm like the air force — of Latin America would not be a very effective element on the western side, outside the area of Latin America.

15. It is realized that conditions vary greatly from one country to another and that considerations which have no bearing in the case of, for instance, Brazil, might be important in Peru. The purpose of this memorandum is to suggest various aspects of this question, in the hope that it may elicit observations on the conditions in individual countries and also on the general policy issue.

POSSIBLE SALE OF F-86'S TO ARGENTINA

On November 2, we saw Margrave of the State Department's Office of Munitions Control, and passed on to him the info contained in the first paragraph of your telegram under reference.

2. Margrave told us that US authorities have been perturbed lately by the "prospection" for jet aircrafts carried out by Argentine authorities in various countries. According to Margrave, USA authorities have been approached with a request for "advanced type of aircrafts" and so, he believed, have the UK and France.

3. Margrave said that the OMC would not view with favour a large purchase of jet fighters by Argentina at the present time. Such purchase would create serious payment difficulties for Argentine authorities; furthermore, in his opinion, these authorities have no realistic appraisal of the cost of, and requirements for operating such aircrafts. Their personnel and ground facilities are inadequate. If Argentina has money to spare for defence expenditures there are some more pressing needs to be met and Argentina's defence would be better served if available funds were expended more discriminately. Margrave said that USA military missions in Argentina were trying to impress on Argentine authorities the need for a realistic appraisal of their own requirements. He added that Argentine authorities were not at the present time considering the purchase of aircrafts in the spirit of consultation and cooperation desirable for integrated continental defence. In addition, a large purchase of aircrafts by Argentina would likely be seen with misgiving by Brazil and other South American countries. Margrave concluded that any info on possible sales of jet aircrafts to Argentina which Canadian authorities could provide to USA authorities would be most welcome, considering their present concern.

4. As you are aware Canadair manufactures and sells F-86 Sabre Jets under license from North American Aviation Company of California. It is our understanding that under the terms of the licensing agreement sales abroad of F-86's by Canadair are conditional on prior approval by North Aviation, which in turn seeks the concurrence of the State Department before the sale is approved. Should a serious prospect of sale by Canadair to Argentina ever materialize, the State Department would, therefore, be seized of the question sooner or later. You will remember that because of this control you decided to seek the State Department's views on a possible sale of F-86's to Venezuela when you had it under consideration in March 1955.

5. Under these circumstances you might wish now to consider whether it would be appropriate and advisable to keep the State Department informed of further developments with regard to this particular sale whereof you may be aware. In our opinion, it might be more difficult to overcome the State Department's objections, assuming we ever had to do so, should they feel rightly or wrongly that we have not kept them in the picture.

POSSIBLE SALE OF F-86'S TO ARGENTINA

1. There is set out below the text of a message prepared in answer to your telegram under reference. This text is to be considered by ministers, probably on Saturday morning (November 10), and you should take no action on it until you receive further instructions from us following that ministerial consideration. Text begins:

We agree that information on sale can be supplied to U.S. authorities but are concerned by implications of Margrave's observations.

2. You may inform Margrave in confirmation of the public announcement made by Argentina Government (which has obviously attracted attention) that Canadair have offered new F-86 aircraft from Canadian production to the Argentine Government with the approval of North American Aviation Company, and have now received the Argentine Government's letter of intent covering the purchase of 36 aircraft subject of course to granting of an export permit by Canada.

3. You should explain further that we have been aware of these negotiations, and have been informed that North American Aviation were previously negotiating for the sale to Argentina of F-100 aircraft at the time when the State Department offered the Argentine Government a gift of reconditioned F-86 aircraft. It is our information that this offer was subsequently withdrawn when North American Aviation protested that the free offer of reconditioned aircraft was in direct opposition to the company's commercial interest. We understand further that this offer has been reinstated now that North American Aviation is out of the picture.

4. The F-100 aircraft costs approximately two and one half times the price of the F-86.

5. The prospect of a sale is public knowledge following the Argentine announcement, and Argentine officials are expected to arrive in Canada shortly. Canadair has kept North American Aviation fully informed of their negotiations and also has kept the Canadian Government informed. The Canadian Government knows no reason to discourage Canadair from continuing with this business and is not persuaded by what Margrave has said that any compelling reason does exist.

6. If our information is correct that the offer by Canadair had prior approval of North American Aviation, and that North American Aviation had previously offered a considerably more expensive plane to the Argentine Government, apparently with the knowledge of the State Department, the considerations advanced by Margrave are not very convincing.

7. You will recall the unhappy experience which occurred in the course of our negotiations with the Belgians for the sale of the CF-100 when, after we had experienced difficulties with the U.S. over a security aspect, the U.S. offered as mutual aid another aircraft involving the same security problem. You may refer to this case at your discretion.

8. In any event the Canadian Government is interested in seeing a Canadian defence industry obtain this business, and under all the circumstances would be very hesitant to intervene at this stage by refusal of export permit. We would take a serious view of the matter, in the light of the information referred to above, if this business were now lost to Canadair through USA intervention, and particularly if it were subsequently to be taken up by a USA firm or by the US Government.

F-86'S FOR ARGENTINA

This is to confirm, somewhat belatedly, the information given by Kirkwood on the telephone. The Prime Minister and Mr. Howe both considered it important that USA commercial interests should not prevent the proposed sale.

We therefore think it desirable to make our views known pretty promptly, even in Margrave's absence. It would appear to us best to take the matter up in his absence at the higher rather than the lower level. We recognize that this involves some risk of consolidating USA objections which may so far be only tentative, but we nevertheless consider it desirable that they know our attitude soon. If the USA is in fact likely to interfere through the licensing arrangement it is important for us to know this as soon as possible, and equally we should wish to learn promptly of any USA objections which might be more substantial than those put forward by Margrave.

PROPOSED SALE OF F86'S TO ARGENTINA

Your last telegram under reference was received on November 19 in the morning; we had already arranged to see Margrave that afternoon. We therefore called on him to transmit your views as contained in your EE-236 November 9.

2. Upon learning the purpose of our visit Margrave said that he had just received from North American Aviation a letter requesting the State Department's concurrence in their approval of Canadair's prospective sale to the Argentine Government. The question Margrave said was therefore ripe for consideration.

3. We conveyed to Margrave the info contained in paragraphs 2 to 5 inclusive of your EE-236. This was, we said, what we knew of the background of Canadair's proposed sale and the state which their negotiations with the Argentinians had already reached. In view of this info we emphasized the points he had made at our previous meeting against a purchase of jet fighters by Argentina could not be found compelling by Canadian ministers and they saw no reasons to discourage Canadair. We added that if the sale were to be lost to Canadair through the intervention of the USA Government and as a result taken by a USA firm, we would indeed take a serious view of the matter.

4. Margrave's comments were that some aspects of our info were not altogether true to the story as he knew it. At no time, he said, had the State Department made any definite offer of reconditioned F86's to Argentina, as a gift. It was true, on the other hand, that a proposal to that effect had been raised within the USA administration. However, this proposal was tentative and so far had only received preliminary consideration. Margrave explained at some length that a decision on military aid of this kind was only reached after searching and lengthy consideration. He said that in the present circumstances it was far from certain that an offer of reconditioned F86's to Argentina could, in fact, be made.

5. You will appreciate that speaking to this point Margrave was coming close to indicating whether or not they would make an offer to Argentina. He was therefore purposely vague and would not be drawn out. While he probably had in mind the stage reached by Canadair in its negotiations, as well as the time required for a decision to offer military assistance and perhaps also technical questions (such as the availability of reconditioned F86's), we got the impression that the first of these "present circumstances" was uppermost in his mind. In other words, and we hope this is not too favourable an interpretation of his vague language, he may have been telling us that no offer of reconditioned F86's would be made in a way as would lose the sale for Canadair.

6. As for North American's offer to Argentina, the State Department had been aware, Margrave said, of North American's intentions to sell F100's to the Argentine Government; but the State Department had not been kept fully in the picture and did not know how and to what extent North American's negotiations with Argentine authorities had proceeded. In any event, whatever the outcome of these negotiations, the State Department would not repeat not have authorized the export of F100's to Argentina. Margrave was definite on this point although he did not make clear whether the OMC position in this matter had been known to North American and provoked North American's withdrawal from the picture. USA authorities, Margrave explained, consider that the Argentinians have no need for such advanced aircrafts as the F100's and would not be in a position to operate them efficiently. Furthermore, in their estimation this sale would cause concern to Argentina's neighbours and it would be undesirable to introduce any reason for tension in the area (these were much the same points Margrave had advanced against a purchase of jet aircraft by Argentina at our previous meeting). Incidentally, Margrave added that USA authorities do not rate very highly Latin America's contribution to continental defence. They found little reason, therefore, to provide Latin American armed forces with advanced equipment since these forces would probably prove of little avail if ever put to the test.

7. According to Margrave the Argentinians' desire was to obtain F86's. They had not shown great interest in any other types of aircraft. But North American had dismantled its F86's production line and was no longer able to provide them. Therefore, considering the State Department's veto on F100's and North American's inability to procure the Argentinians the plane they wished to purchase, there was little likelihood of the USA supplying the Argentine Government with aircrafts on a commercial basis. Margrave assured us that USA commercial interests had not and would not in any way affect the OMC's position with regard to the supply of jet aircraft to Argentina. Conversely the political factors which would be taken into account by the OMC in reaching their position could not be used as a cloak to further USA commercial interests.

8. While welcoming Margrave's assurances, we pointed out that the commercial competition element had been removed and that the question had then taken quite a different turn. North American being out of the picture, we understood that the Argentinians could be supplied F86's in either of two ways — in the form of USA military aid or else supplied by Canadair on a commercial basis. Margrave confirmed that this was the situation. If no offer of reconditioned F86's was made and accepted, not only would USA authorities not disapprove of a sale of F86's by Canadair but would actually welcome it. In his opinion Canadair should then have priority over any other sources of supply. USA authorities were not unsympathetic with the Argentinians' desire to modernize their armed forces, especially with North American equipment as long as they kept within the bounds of reason. Margrave added that the acquisition of 36 F86's by the Argentine Air Force did not appear unreasonable.

9. In spite of these reassurances we stated flatly (in accordance with the last paragraph of your telegram EE-236) that if Argentine business was lost to Canadair through a USA gift offer, we would take as serious a view of the matter as if it were lost to USA commercial interests as a result of USA Government intervention. Negotiations between Canadair and the Argentinians had reached an advanced state. Furthermore the Canadian Government was interested in seeing a Canadian defence industry get this business. We said that the USA administration might have substantial objections of a non-commercial nature to Canadair's transaction with the Argentinians. If it was so we would wish to know of them and take them into account in our further consideration of this sale. We added that a serious situation would develop if the Canadian Government were to approve the export of F86's to Argentina and the State Department then exercised their control over North American to prevent such export.

10. Margrave was quick to take up the latter point. He said, speaking generally, that, if the American authorities saw objections to the sale of F86's to any particular country, they would try and convince Canadian authorities of the validity of their views while the export application was still under consideration. Assuming Canadian authorities decided to disregard USA objections and take a decision running counter to USA counsel, it would be "most unlikely, in fact almost unthinkable", he said, that the State Department would use the licensing device to foil the Canadian decision.

11. As for the OMC's objections to the proposed sale, Margrave said there seemed to be no need to state any in detail at the present time. In fact, if the USA administration did not decide to offer a gift of reconditioned F86's to Argentina, the OMC would raise no objection to Canadair's prospective sale. If, on the other hand, such a decision was taken there would be further consultation with us. We asked Margrave when we could expect their decision to be made known to us. He answered it would be in the course of next week.

12. It is difficult to interpret Margrave's statements so as to get a clear picture of USA intention at the present time. However, in our opinion the following points seem to have emerged from this and our previous meetings with him. When Margrave enquired on October 25 whether we had any info on Canadair's proposed sale to Argentina (our telegram 1929 October 25†), no question of competing commercial interest was involved — there was however the question of a possible offer of reconditioned F86's to Argentina. Some of the points made at our following meeting on November 2 (inadequacy of technical competence and ground facilities, cost of operation, misgivings of other South American countries) may have been considerations which in the opinion of USA authorities weighted against a gift. Perhaps Margrave raised them to impress on us the interest USA authorities took in the matter. As long as no prospective purchase of aircraft by Argentina was in view they could take their time in deciding the question of military aid. However, with Canadair in the picture, they found it necessary to ascertain from us whether there was any serious prospect of sale as their decision on a gift would obviously have to be hastened thereby.

13. We asked Margrave whether the Argentinians were aware that an offer of reconditioned F86's to them was being considered. He said he was not in a position to answer. We had in mind, of course, that if the Argentinians were not aware of the gift offer they might reconsider their purchase from Canadair if they heard of this or the offer was made. They may, on the other hand, have been aware all along of a possible offer and in spite of it have decided to sign the letter of intent. A third possibility would be for them to have tried to elicit a decision from USA authorities on the gift proposal by negotiating with Canadair.

14. We felt, however, on leaving Margrave that he was well aware of how seriously we would view a gift offer now being made to Argentina by USA authorities and this business thereby being lost to Canadair. He was also impressed by the strong reaction his previous comments relating to Canadair's proposed transactions had provoked on the part of the Canadian Government. Furthermore considering that a gift offer has only received preliminary consideration and the time which, according to Margrave, is necessary to arrive at a decision on such an offer, it does not seem likely that within a week USA authorities will be able to do much more than abandon the suggestion that an offer be made. It may be therefore that in giving USA authorities until the middle of next week to inform us of their position Margrave dropped a strong hint on what this position will be.

14. We called Margrave again this morning to reaffirm the views and comments we had expressed earlier this week and in particular the adverse effects of a USA offer to Argentina on the latter's letter of intent. He assured us once more that the USA Government was well aware of the Canadian position and that a decision to offer military aid would not be taken lightly. He also reaffirmed that no offer had been made so far to the Argentinians. Once again we asked Margrave whether the Argentinians had any knowledge that such an offer was under consideration. He said that he did not know; the USA Military Mission in Argentina might have hinted to the Argentinians that such an offer might be made. His own guess was that no such hint had been made but he could not be sure before receipt of a report from the mission. This he expects to receive shortly. He readily agreed with us that if such a hint were dropped the danger of the Argentinians having second thought would be increased.

15. As for the date on which the USA Government decision would be made known to us, Margrave said he could make no definite promise but would probably be in a position to inform us of their position in the course of next week.

PROPOSED SALE OF F86'S TO ARGENTINA

Margrave of the OMC called this afternoon to give us the following information. A USA offer of reconditioned F86's to Argentina is now out of the question and the State Department will raise no objections to Canadair's sale "on an unclassified basis," i.e., they understand the aircrafts exported to Argentina would be stripped of firing devices subject to security restrictions. We have arranged to meet Margrave on December 4 for a more detailed story.

SABRE JETS

Final negotiations on purchasing Canadair Sabre jets by Argentine Air Force were unexpectedly suspended when mission which was about to leave on December 22 received counter orders. I gather from non official sources that Treasury Minister refused to grant Air Minister the necessary funds from Central Bank on December 28 under pressure from Navy to secure credit for purchase from USA of 20 second hand planes and an aircraft carrier to match one acquired last week by Brazil. It was announced yesterday that negotiations were being carried on with USA to buy second hand Panther jet planes at 30000 dollars each cash, plus cost of delivery and reconditioning. Delay seems to be caused by interservice rivalry, but there is yet a chance that a compromise between naval and air force can be arrived at. I understand Air Minister still hopes to salvage at least part of Canadair deal.

APPROVAL OF PROPOSED COMMERCIAL MODUS VIVENDI WITH HONDURAS

1. The purpose of this Memorandum is to review for the consideration of Cabinet negotiations that have just been concluded between Canada and Honduras for the exchange of most-favoured-nation treatment.

2. Background—Since June 1955 trade agreement negotiations have proceeded in Honduras between the Canadian Government Trade Commissioner and a Special Commission appointed for that purpose by the Government of Honduras. These negotiations represent the third occasion since the Second World War on which Canada has endeavoured to conclude a trade agreement with Honduras. At present Honduras is the only Latin American country with which Canada does not exchange most-favoured-nation treatment.

In February 1946, the Honourable James A. McKinnon, then Minister of Trade and Commerce visited Honduras and the two countries agreed to negotiate a commercial modus vivendi. However it was subsequently decided to postpone such an agreement until both countries had been able to review the situation in the light of the GATT discussions then pending.

Early in 1950 the Canadian Government made arrangements for the visit to Honduras of a Canadian delegation which was empowered to sign a commercial modus vivendi with Honduras.[6] However, Honduras was not willing to extend full most-favoured-nation treatment to Canada since, until recently, Honduran policy was to grant reduced rates only to the United States.

During the present negotiations Honduras at first proposed to exempt from most-favoured-nation treatment certain luxury items (e.g. cars, shirts, toiletries) on which they had granted reductions to the United States. However, the Canadian representatives maintained that we were not prepared to agree to any limitation on most-favoured-nation treatment because of the implications and principles involved. Agreement has now been reached between the Canadian representative and the Honduran Government for the exchange of full most-favoured-nation treatment between the two countries. The text of the proposed agreement is attached. This is similar to existing agreements with several other Latin American countries.

3. Results—The effect of an exchange of most-favoured-nation treatment with Honduras will be to place Canadian exporters of wheat flour, upper leather, rubber tires, sardines and some other products on an equal footing with the United States who at present enjoy a marked advantage through lower rates of duty. (The new Honduran tariff of April, 1955 has further increased this disparity.) Honduras would benefit in the Canadian market principally through the extension of more favourable tariff treatment for bananas and coffee.

The trade between the two countries is small. In 1954-55 Canada's exports to Honduras averaged half a million dollars, and imports from Honduras were approximately two million dollars annually. Principal Canadian exports in recent years have been upper leather, rubber tires, powdered and condensed milk, while imports from Honduras have consisted almost entirely of bananas (90 per cent of total imports), and grapefruit, Honduras has trade agreement relations only with the United States to which it has reduced duties on certain products. While the tariff preference enjoyed exclusively by the United States has restricted and, in some cases, excluded Canadian sales, the volume of U.S. exports indicates that a worthwhile market exists for a number of these products. Honduras is, moreover, a completely open dollar market with no import or exchange restrictions.

4. Recommendations

I recommend, with the concurrence of the Ministers of Trade and Commerce and Finance

(a) that Cabinet approve the trade agreement between Canada and Honduras which has now been negotiated, and

(b) that Mr. Harry A. Scott, Canadian Ambassador to Cuba be authorized to sign this agreement on behalf of Canada in Tegucigalpa, Honduras.[7]

RECOGNITION OF THE INDEPENDENCE OF TUNISIA AND MOROCCO

In Protocols of March 2 and 20 respectively, the French Government recognized the independence of Morocco and Tunisia. As foreseen in the terms of the Protocols, negotiations are currently proceeding to define what the French Government has referred to as the future status of "interdependence" between both countries and France, "particularly in matters of defence and foreign relations." The French and Moroccans have already signed a diplomatic convention which is now in force, and negotiations are now being held on a Franco-Tunisian diplomatic convention. The French Parliament will shortly be called upon to ratify the Protocols granting independence, although the texts of the Protocols do not specify that the independence of Tunisia and Morocco is in any way conditional upon either French ratification or the conclusion of conventions on interdependence. France has therefore recognized these two countries de jure and hopes other friendly countries will do likewise.

The United States and the United Kingdom were anxious for political reasons to give formal recognition to Tunisia and Morocco as soon as possible. They wished to establish their diplomatic missions in Rabat and Tunis before the missions of the Arab League or the Soviet bloc. The United Kingdom Government recognized both countries de jure on May 10. It will shortly open a diplomatic mission in Morocco and will establish one in Tunisia after the French and Tunisians have reached agreement on a diplomatic convention. The United States has also recognized de jure; it is expected to name very soon its Ambassador to Morocco and will exchange diplomatic missions with Tunisia as soon as appropriate.

Twelve other governments have recognized de jure including Italy, Spain, Switzerland, Portugal, most of the Arab states, both Chinese Governments and Indonesia. De facto recognition has been accorded by nine countries including the U.S.S.R. and the satellites, India, Turkey, Ethiopia and Saudi Arabia.

The question of Canadian recognition of Tunisia and Morocco has been raised informally by our Embassy in Paris with the French authorities. The Embassy has been informed that the French Government has no objection to friendly countries granting de jure recognition to either Tunisia or Morocco.

I think it is desirable that as many countries of the West as possible should welcome the emergence of Tunisia and Morocco to independent status. Although we have no present intention of establishing diplomatic missions, I consider that Canadian recognition of the two new states would be appreciated by them and would help in attaining the worthwhile object of keeping them in friendly and close relations with western countries. Both countries are sensitive about their status and the earlier Canada can recognize, the more credit we are likely to get — especially if we act before the United States and the United Kingdom establish diplomatic missions in the near future.

I therefore recommend that the Cabinet approve that congratulatory messages should be sent to the Prime Ministers of Morocco and Tunisia. These messages would constitute de jure recognition by Canada.

I also recommend that the Cabinet approve that a congratulatory message should be sent to the Premier of France whose Government has, in spite of domestic political difficulties, shown a great deal of courage in concluding the arrangements for recognizing the independence of Tunisia and Morocco.[1]

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], August 15, 1956

IMMIGRATION FROM NORTH AFRICA AND CANADA'S RELATIONS WITH NORTH AFRICA

Over the last six months the Department of Citizenship and Immigration has received an increasing number of enquiries from prospective immigrants in North Africa. In March Mr. Brunet, the officer in charge of the Canadian Immigration office in Paris, was asked by his Department to make a survey to Tunisia and Morocco but this was postponed since the French authorities took no action to grant permission for Mr. Brunet's trip and since our Embassy considered that it would not be advisable to make a formal approach to the French until the situation in Algeria had improved. Meanwhile the Department of Citizenship and Immigration had reluctantly decided to deal with accumulated correspondence from French settlers in North Africa in routine fashion from Paris.

2. However, in a letter to me of July 24†, copy attached, Mr. Fortier has now asked that the appropriate authorities in Morocco and Tunisia be approached in order to obtain permission for an immigration team to visit those countries and examine potential immigrants for Canada. Mr. Fortier would also like us to ask the French Government for permission

[1] Le 14 juin 1956, le Cabinet a accepté de reconnaître de jure la Tunisie et le Maroc « it being understood that further consideration would be given to the manner by which this would be extended. » Le premier ministre a envoyé des télégrammes de félicitations le 19 juin 1956. Les télégrammes sont reproduits dans Canada, ministère des Affaires extérieures, Affaires extérieures, vol. 8, nº 7, juillet 1956, p. 186.

On 14 June 1956 Cabinet agreed to recognize de jure Tunisia and Morocco "it being understood that further consideration would be given to the manner by which this would be extended." Congratulatory telegrams were sent by the Prime Minister on 19 June 1956 and reprinted in Canada, Department of External Affairs, External Affairs, Vol. 8, No. 7, July 1956, p. 178.

for an immigration team to visit Algeria. He has pointed out that Citizenship and Immigration had received about 6,000 applications from persons residing in North Africa who wish to come to Canada as immigrants (3,058 in Morocco, 2,206 in Algeria and 693 in Tunisia). Most of them are farmers, professional men and industrialists — highly desirable people from Immigration's point of view. The existing arrangements for processing applications are totally inadequate and only a trickle of immigrants are coming forward. If we cannot send an immigration team to North Africa, Mr. Fortier has suggested that consular offices might be established, staffed by persons qualified to deal with immigration cases.

3. This request raises very delicate political questions which affect the whole field of our relations with France and the emerging states of North Africa. It is in that general context that I think it can best be approached.

4. Although Canada undoubtedly has both potential immigration and trade interests in North Africa, our overriding interest in the area is that it should remain friendly to the West and should not fall a prey to governments motivated by extreme Arab nationalism of the Nasser stripe. While we would hope for a liberal solution in Algeria which would satisfactorily accommodate the interests of both the French and the Moslem communities, we can at present take into account only our relations with Tunisia and Morocco. In view of the very deep roots which France still has in Tunisia and Morocco in spite of the present shadow cast by the Algerian military operations, I take it that one of our first aims should be to do everything within our power to encourage a close and continuing relationship between France and her former territories.

5. To send a Canadian immigration team to Tunisia and Morocco in order to facilitate the emigration of Frenchmen but not of native Tunisians and Moroccans would, I believe, be an unfortunate opening gambit in our relations with these two countries.[2] It would be resented both by the French Government and by the Moroccan and Tunisian Governments. The French Government would feel we were interfering with French citizens in a delicate situation in which French policy is endeavouring to maintain a real "interdependence" based on the presence of substantial French communities and French economic interests in both Morocco and Tunisia. For their part, the Moroccan and Tunisian Governments could hardly overlook the obvious discrimination against the non-French portions of their population.

6. To make an official request for a Canadian immigration team to visit Algeria in present circumstances would, in my opinion, be inviting an awkward rebuff.[3] We know that the French Minister Resident recommended against it in April. Now that the French Government are about to try to introduce reforms which will be resented and may be resisted by the colons, our Embassy in Paris also feels (their telegram No. 553 of August 1†, attached) that we should defer any action which might make the French Government's task in Algeria more difficult.

7. We might, however, be able to meet Col. Fortier's request in another way which would not only be more acceptable to the local authorities but would give us first-hand material we badly need in considering future Canadian relations with the area. I wonder if we might not plan to send to North Africa this fall a three-man team headed by a senior member of our service, accompanied by representatives of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. The primary purpose of this team would be to explore directly with the Moroccan and Tunisian Governments the whole range of Canada's future relations with these new countries.[4] The visit would be exploratory and could in no sense make commitments on behalf of the Canadian Government to consider in due course the possibility of establishing in the area a Canadian diplomatic mission to which Trade and Immigration officers might be attached. In addition to Tunisia and Morocco, a visiting team could easily go on to Libya as well. Although Libya's stability and Western orientation may be uncomfortably dependent on its present king, I think if we do send a visiting team to the area we should include Libya on the itinerary.[5]

8. I am reasonably certain that such an exploratory mission should not attempt to visit Algeria in present circumstances,[6] though we might consider it later if the French make progress both towards the pacification of the area and a political solution. In any case, if you approve of the idea of an exploratory mission this fall, and we secure the cooperation of the other departments concerned, I think we should discuss the whole project with the French Government before raising it with the Tunisians and Moroccans, probably through their Missions in Paris with whom our Embassy has already established contact.[7] There would then be opportunities for sounding out the French informally as to whether they thought the time was ripe for a visit to Algeria by Canadian officials.

9. Apart from providing us with a more acceptable way of giving some satisfaction to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, a visiting team such as I have suggested would, I think, be useful to us in (a) exploring the possible location and type of mission which might best serve to develop Canadian interests in the area, within the limits of our capabilities; and (b) establishing our first direct contacts with senior officials of the Moroccan and Tunisian Governments and securing for ourselves an assessment which has not been to some extent filtered in advance by the French.[8]

10. For several years we have, it is true, received many excellent reports, chiefly from United Kingdom Missions and from the officers of our Embassy in Paris who from time to time visited North Africa. It was nevertheless inevitable that they should be largely dependent upon their French hosts for making contacts with the local population and in particular with the emerging nationalist leaders. While our delegation in New York had some sporadic contacts with these leaders during recent years, when the Moroccan and Tunisian questions were before the United Nations, it remains very difficult for us to assess intelligently, on the basis largely of indirect evidence and opinion, what the future orientation of Tunisia, Morocco and Libya is likely to be. As we have suggested in a previous paper,† all three of these new countries might fairly rapidly gravitate towards Cairo if the Algerian war continues. It is of the utmost importance that Western countries with interests in the area — and this includes Canada — should do what they can, both in North Africa and in Paris, to prevent the present strong economic, defence and political ties between North Africa and Western Europe from being eroded by Arab nationalism.

11. As for where an eventual mission might be located, and what type of mission would be best suited to our requirements and to local conditions, we can offer only one or two suggestions which might be in the minds of any visiting team of Canadian officials you might decide to send to the area. In the first place, I take it for granted that consulates headed by immigration officers are out of the question and that you have in mind one Mission[9] accredited to all three countries (Morocco, Tunisia and Libya). I also assume that we should not try to open a Consulate in Algeria before we have established some kind of Mission in Rabat or Tunis; in the eyes of the North Africans we are sufficiently identified with the French already. From the point of view of geographical convenience and also because the Tunisians are the most sophisticated and generally Western in outlook, Tunis might be considered as the most appropriate place; but there can be little doubt that our Canadian interests, from the point of view of trade and defence especially, are stronger in Morocco. Meanwhile, our Embassy in Paris have reported that in the opinion of the Quai d'Orsay the Tunisians and Moroccans would have no objection to countries which could not be separately represented in both countries accrediting a single Mission to them both and to Libya as well.

12. I would also hesitate to make any firm recommendation as to what type of mission would be most appropriate. It should, I think be headed by a member of our Service and should include Trade and Immigration officers. The Mission would presumably for some time have to be headed by a Chargé d'Affaires. Having in mind our general experience with double accreditations, there would be much to be said for having the Chargé d'Affaires on his own — as in Warsaw and Prague. We would then avoid the awkward question of which of our European Heads of Mission might be the absentee Ambassador or Minister. Paris, Madrid and Rome would each have their separate disadvantages; we already know that the French were upset by the recent suggestion that the Swedish Ambassador in Rome should be accredited also in Rabat and Tunis. If it were decided to adopt the dual accreditation procedure, however, I should think that we might consider the Head of one of our smaller posts, such as Berne,[10] being given this additional assignment.

13. As for when a new Canadian Mission in North Africa might be opened, I would again hesitate to make any recommendation. I would not suggest that Rabat or Tunis should have priority over Canadian Missions planned for the Philippines, Burma or Iran,[11] though I am inclined to think that North Africa is more important to Canada than the other countries I have mentioned and might be useful not only for Canadian but for NATO and other Western interests as well. This too, however, might be easier to determine in the light of the report of a Canadian exploratory team such as I had recommended. In any case, we will be able to use our Paris and United Nations contacts to keep in direct touch with the Tunisians and Moroccans until we can open a Mission in the area.

14. In the meantime, I understand that the Department of Citizenship and Immigration would not press us for a visiting immigration team or for the opening of consulates in North Africa if we planned to include one of their officials on such an exploratory team, for neither the prospective French or Jewish emigrants from Tunisia and Morocco appear to be in any immediate danger. We have, as you know, been approached by Mr. Saul Hayes, the Executive Director of the Canadian Jewish Congress, regarding the possibility of about 200 Jews from North Africa emigrating to Canada. However the Cadima, the Jewish organization assisting the emigration of Jews from Morocco, has recently run into serious trouble with the Moroccan Government which does not wish to see its residents emigrate from Morocco, particularly if they happen to wish to go to Israel. Mr. Hayes has therefore told us that the Canadian Jewish Congress has decided it would be inopportune to pursue the matter further for the time being. Presumably they would not hesitate to press the matter if they thought that Jews in North Africa were in immediate danger of persecution. If you agree, therefore, I suggest that we should let this matter rest until either the Canadian Jewish Congress raises it with us again or we have evidence of an urgent humanitarian need for Jews to emigrate from North Africa.[12] If necessary I think we could then handle those who wish to come to Canada expeditiously and with a minimum of formality.

15. I should be grateful for your guidance so that I may reply to Col. Fortier. In any case you may wish to discuss this whole question with the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

16. So that preparatory studies of trade possibilities could be set in hand, we should want to give the Department of Trade and Commerce adequate notice of our proposal. In the Department, we would also want to give some advance thought to the possibilities for cultural and educational interchange with French-speaking North Africa, in addition to the political and defence aspects we have reviewed in earlier papers.

17. Although it is not directly related to the subject of this Memorandum, I think you will be interested in the attached article from La Presse,† of June 23, welcoming the Prime Minister's congratulatory telegrams recognizing Tunisia and Morocco, and looking forward to the day when Canada would be exchanging diplomatic Missions and developing economic and cultural relations with these new countries.[13]

EXPLORATORY CANADIAN MISSION TO NORTH AFRICA

We had a full discussion of this proposal yesterday with Basdevant, Director General of Moroccan and Tunisian Affairs at the Quai. He greeted it with warm enthusiasm and said that he appreciated particularly the thoughtfulness of the Canadian Government in informing the French of their plan in advance. He then immediately went on to say that he expected we were planning to inform the Moroccans and Tunisians ourselves, and he considered this to be particularly desirable in view of what he described as their excessive sensitivity.

2. He made no observations about the intended composition of the delegation, nor on the implications of the presence of a representative of the Department of Immigration. He likewise had no particular views to offer on the possibility that the mission might visit Libya. He nevertheless left the impression that the French did not consider this to be of much importance and it seemed to be his view that the team could leave out Libya without causing offence. On the other hand, it would of course be for Canada to decide whether there would be advantages in developing relations there.

3. As to the eventual exchange of diplomatic missions with Morocco and Tunisia, he said that in his opinion it would be absolutely necessary to treat the two countries equally. He therefore counselled strongly against a plan to have only one office in the area, because in whichever country it was located the other would be offended. Mr. Pineau had made the same point very definitely in conversation at the Embassy last week. Basdevant went on to review the advantages of choosing the Ambassador in Paris to be the Head of the Mission to the two countries until independent Heads of Mission could be appointed. We did not raise this point with him but he went over the usual French arguments in detail and said again that in the French view such an arrangement would be acceptable to both the Tunisians and the Moroccans. He thought that the choice of the Ambassador in Lisbon for Morocco would be rather artificial and in some ways impractical. He was, of course, careful to say that this was naturally something for the Canadian Government to decide, although the French would hope that their susceptibilities about the appointment of the Ambassador in Madrid to Morocco and in Rome to Tunisia would be taken into account when the decision was made.

4. Although Algerian affairs are not the responsibility of the Quai, we drew his attention to the fact that Algeria was not mentioned in the proposed itinerary.

5. He said that the French Embassies in Tunis and Rabat would wish to put themselves "officieusement" in touch with the Mission and would of course be prepared to give assistance wherever they could, while recognizing that the Mission's main contacts would naturally be directly with the Moroccan and Tunisian authorities. He hoped that we would inform him when plans were made so that he could tell the two French embassies.

6. Basdevant's reaction was clearly most favourable and he raised no question about the proposed timing of the visit. In these circumstances we hope that you will be able to go ahead with the plans and instruct us as soon as possible to talk them over with the Tunisian and Moroccan Missions in Paris. Before we do so, however, we hope you will be able to give us a fuller picture of just what the Mission will be doing and to give us some indication of the itinerary and interviews they will wish to arrange. We would also suggest that after the Tunisians and Moroccans have been informed, the plans be discussed with UK and USA officials, as their representatives in the area will no doubt be able and willing to give assistance. Both Embassies here have had some responsibility in Tunisia and Morocco and their officials in Paris may therefore still be in a position to help.

7. We are reporting separately on Basdevant's review of the present internal political situation in Tunisia and Morocco.

INTERDEPARTMENTAL MISSION TO NORTH AFRICA: IMMIGRATION POLICY

Yesterday Daridan raised the question of Canadian immigration policy in North Africa, obviously as a result of the info we had given to the Quai about the proposed interdepartmental mission. He began by stressing the willingness of the French Government to assist the visits of Canadian officials and their confidence in our understanding of the French position. He also stressed that there was no intention on the part of the French to attempt to limit the emigration of French citizens who might wish to leave North Africa, and certainly none to dissuade them from going to Canada. This being said, however, Mr. Pineau had wanted him to express to us his hope that we would not at this time embark on an immigration campaign which would attract publicity which, in turn, the French would consider unhelpful to them in the particular period of the development of their relations in North Africa.

2. We assured him that French feelings on this matter were understood and were being taken into account, and explained that one of the factors which influenced the composition of the mission was the desire to avoid undue attention being attracted to our immigration interests. We said that we would, of course, pass on the Foreign Minister's views and felt confident that there was no present plan to embark on anything which would appear as an immigration campaign. On the other hand, Canada was anxious to assist the entry of qualified French immigrants and we therefore felt it necessary to study what might appropriately be done at this time. To indicate the Canadian understanding of the French problem we drew his attention to the fact that we had not suggested that the team should visit Algeria.

3. Daridan repeated his confidence in the Canadian handling of this question but said that his Minister had thought it well to let us know that since this question was last discussed the French still considered that an active immigration campaign in Morocco and Tunisia could raise some difficulties for them.

EXPLORATORY MISSION TO NORTH AFRICA

I think you should be forewarned that Mr. Harris may raise with you the possible financial implications of the Canadian exploratory mission which is to visit Morocco and Tunisia later this month. This morning at an inter-departmental meeting held to consider the brief for the mission, the representative of the Department of Finance, Mr. Hockin, expressed his Department's concern lest even the presence of an informal and exploratory Canadian mission should inspire the Moroccan and Tunisian Governments to request economic assistance from Canada in terms which might be embarrassing to refuse. He thought he should report to his Minister when the latter returns to Ottawa in a day or two.

2. We explained, as did the representatives of Trade and Commerce and Immigration, that the proposed mission had received the blessing of the three Ministers who appear to be most directly concerned, and that our primary purpose was to gather more information on a new and important area of great political and strategic importance to NATO and the West generally. Immigration were interested in clearing up between six and eight thousand applications from potential immigrants to Canada, and Trade and Commerce thought that if monetary and trade restrictions (which had tended to keep North African trade directed towards France) were removed there was a developing potential market for Canadian trade. We all stressed that absolutely no commitments of any kind would be made by members of the mission on economic aid or other subjects. This point is spelt out explicitly in the covering brief prepared for the mission. The wording of the economic aid paragraph had been cleared in advance with the Department of Finance to whom we have referred for information from the beginning copies of all papers on this subject.

3. We also made the point that although economic aid was quite likely to crop up as one of the topics of conversation in an informal mission of this kind, there would be no difficulty about parrying such inquiries and little likelihood of any such request being made officially, at least until a Canadian mission or missions had been established in the area. Cabinet would, of course, be asked to consider the question of diplomatic representation in the event that it was subsequently decided, partly as a result of the visiting mission's report, to recommend the establishment of diplomatic posts in the area. We had, therefore, supposed that the question of involving the Government in impossible requests for economic aid would be taken into account at that time rather than at the present stage of sending an exploratory mission of officials.

4. I am enclosing a copy of the introductory paper prepared for the brief for the exploratory mission outlining the reasons for sending the mission, and what we hoped it might accomplish. Detailed background papers† on particular subjects are also being included in the brief and no objection was raised at this morning's meeting of our presentation of the problem, apart from the query of the Department of Finance regarding hypothetical requests for economic aid.

5. As you know, the plans for the visiting mission have reached an advanced stage, permission having been granted by the Tunisian and Moroccan authorities with the warm support of the French, and hotel and travel arrangements having been made. Mr. Beaulieu plans to leave Ottawa on October 10.

6. My impression is that the Department of Finance may be unduly concerned at the prospect of eventually being asked to provide some kind of economic aid for North Africa because of a passing reference, in a Departmental brief prepared for the last NATO Ministerial Council meeting, to the possibility of NATO or NATO members providing economic aid to former French territories in North Africa as a means of encouraging the maintenance of their Western orientation. On that point I am enclosing Mr. Taylor's letter of August 31† to me and my proposed reply.†

Introductory Paper

BRIEF FOR VISITING MISSION TO NORTH AFRICA

Introduction

1. It is not surprising that the latest news from North Africa is of proposals for a North African Federation expected to emerge from discussions between Moroccan and Tunisian and Algerian leaders in Tunis towards the end of October. Already the Sultan of Morocco and Premier Bourguiba of Tunisia have been promoting a negotiated settlement of the Algerian war based on some formula for the independence of Algeria which would at the same time guarantee the rights and investments of the substantial French minority. Having set Tunisia and Morocco free, the French could not be expected to hold the populated coastal departments of Algeria much longer as part of metropolitan France. Although they have not yet unveiled their own pre-Assembly proposals for a negotiated settlement in Algeria, even Marshal Juin has acknowledged publicly that the old order in Algeria is also bound to change.

2. The question not only for France but for other Western countries as well is where today's changes will lead and how they can best be steered into channels which will work co-operatively with the West and not align themselves with Nasser's Pan Arab nationalism. For a violently anti-Western nationalistic movement stretching across North Africa from the Atlantic to the Persian Gulf would vitally affect NATO and Western interests in every sphere — political, economic and defence — cutting us off from the most direct links between Western Europe and the rest of Africa, and depriving us of a strategic position along the south shore of the Mediterranean which is not only necessary for defence but of great present and potential importance for the economy of Western Europe.

3. An area of such significance for NATO and Western Europe must also be important to the North American members of the Atlantic Alliance.

4. Yet, as far as Canada is concerned, we have had hardly any direct contact with the newly independent countries of Tunisia and Morocco. True, a few valuable reports have been received, chiefly from the Ambassador and members of our Embassy in Paris who have visited North Africa in past years; however their contacts have, of necessity, been largely Frenchmen or pro-French Arabs, and our direct contacts with the new leaders of these countries have been confined to a few sporadic conversations with members of our Delegations to the General Assembly.

5. While the Algerian war and the Suez crisis continue, no Tunisian or Moroccan leader will be able to conclude the treaties of friendship and alliance which the French confidently expected would bind independent Tunisia and Morocco with close ties of "interdependence", particularly in terms of defence and foreign affairs, in return for the courageous political decision of the Mendès-France Government in setting Tunisia and Morocco loose as free nations. These interdependence conventions have not been negotiated and French forces remain in Morocco and Tunisia on sufferance. Thus the Western ties which other countries have or can establish are all the more important from the point of view of maintaining the generally Western orientation which the present leaders of Morocco and Tunisia would like to keep. For, though painfully aware of their financial and economic dependence on France, the moderate nationalist leaders in power in both Tunisia and Morocco have felt in no position to risk being accused by many of their compatriots of selling their birth-right — so recently recovered — for a mess of potage.

6. So far, satisfactory defence agreements have yet to be negotiated either by the French or by the Americans with the Moroccans and Tunisians. For all NATO countries, the maintenance of the United States Strategic Air Command bases in Morocco may well be a vital interest. The great French naval base of Bizerta in Tunisia is also of great strategic importance for control of the Western Mediterranean basin. These defence interests of the Western Alliance can be maintained in the long run only if North African political, economic and social ties with Paris and the West prove stronger than the pulls of religion, race, and tradition towards Cairo and the Arab League. This contest is by no means predetermined by the economic dependence of the area upon France. Indeed, Paris alone is, in our opinion, likely to lose the contest unless she has the courage to follow in Algeria the logic of her policies in Tunisia and Morocco, and unless she has the practical help — and not merely the moral support — of her principal Western partners.

7. Direct Canadian interests in the area, in terms of trade or defence, are small. Certainly wherever possible it will be in Canada's interests to strengthen (rather than supplant) these traditional ties with France; but since for the time being all possible Western influences may have to be exerted co-operatively in order to prevent a drift towards Cairo, Canada may have special opportunities as a partly French speaking country not under the political handicaps which for the present limit the usefulness of North African ties with France.

8. There are, then, two primary reasons for sending an exploratory Canadian mission to visit North Africa at this time. The first is to explore directly with the Moroccan and Tunisian Governments the whole range of Canada's future relations with these two countries which we recognized de jure on June 19 this year, and the methods by which Canadian interests can best be promoted. The second is to use these direct contacts to gather material on the basis of which to assess the probable future political orientation of these countries, the degree of internal stability, the general economic situation and trade prospects.

9. The visit is to be exploratory and should in no sense make commitments on behalf of the Canadian Government. At the same time the mission should be prepared to make recommendations in its final report regarding the type of representation in the area which would be best suited to advance Canadian interests. Although the question of eventual Canadian representation in the area is bound to arise in the discussions the mission will have with the Moroccans and Tunisians, the mission will have to explain that Canadian representation cannot be expected to take precedence over prior commitments elsewhere. For this reason it will hardly be possible for the mission to discuss with the Moroccans and Tunisians the question of whether we should have one mission or two and which of our Ambassadors might be accredited, assuming the mission, or missions, were headed locally by Chargés.

10. Another delicate feature of the mission will be to convey our own feeling of friendship and sympathy with the French, and our hopes that French links with North Africa will be maintained, without appearing to be supporting a colonial era now past. The Moroccans and Tunisians are both proud and sensitive and their nationalism is all the more apparent because they have been in a position to manifest it (by means other than violence) for such a short time. The mission should not identify itself with the colons although some of them will be able to give useful information. It would even be advantageous to make the mission's contacts with French officials in Paris and in North Africa as inconspicuous as possible. The impression we wish to give the Moroccans and Tunisians is that of sympathy and understanding in their newly won position in the world. For we consider this attitude is the most likely to foster the Western ties which it is in our interests to preserve.

11. At the same time it is not in Canada's interests to do anything which might add to French difficulties in North Africa. In addition to about 1.4 million French in Algeria (9.5 million population) there are approximately 160,000 French people in Tunisia (3.8 million population) and close to 400,000 in Morocco (9.6 million population). But for the heavy French investment of past years, there would have been little economic development in either country; in recent years the inflow of French capital has almost offset the annual budgeting deficit, but the source of income is now — not unnaturally — drying up.

12. The activities of the mission in the field of immigration will have to be very carefully handled and should not attract any publicity. In the first place the Moroccans and Tunisians will be quick to resent any discrimination in favour of the European populations and are also bound to resent any mass exodus of those with the capital and technical experience on which the future development of their country must in present circumstances depend. In the second place, the French Government are equally reluctant to diminish la présence française by encouraging French emigration from North Africa since they count on this element of the population to maintain the economic ties with France and the Western orientation of Tunisia and Morocco on which their future association with North Africa must depend.

13. It is likely that the possibility of economic assistance from Canada will be raised by Tunisian and Moroccan officials who are anxious to reduce their dependence on France for economic aid. In response to enquiries on this subject members of the mission could point out that the United Nations has an experienced practical organization for technical assistance and Canada is very willing to consider applications through the United Nations for Canadian experts or for the training of Tunisians or Moroccans in Canada. If questions are asked concerning the possibility of direct economic aid from Canada the mission should be absolutely non-committal and should inform us of any such requests on their return.

6. The mission should also be aware of the possibilities of cultural and educational opportunities in Canada for French-speaking people from North Africa, bearing in mind that there is a great need for trained technicians both in Tunisia and Morocco and that those who are reluctant for political reasons to pursue studies in France might wish to avail themselves of education opportunities in Quebec (at their own expense).

7. The attached papers† contain political, economic and military material for the background information of the mission.

SUMMARY OF THE PRELIMINARY REPORT OF THE CANADIAN MISSION TO MOROCCO AND TUNISIA

I am attaching a summary of Mr. Beaulieu's preliminary report on the findings of the Canadian Mission to Morocco and Tunisia. He has suggested that until his report has been cleared with Mr. Campbell Smith of the Department of Trade and Commerce and Mr. Brunet of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, both of whom accompanied him on the Mission, the report should be given only limited circulation.

I have consulted Mr. George of European Division about sections of the report which you might not wish to mention to the French Ambassador. Since these sections were very short I have not included them in the attached summary. The expurgated passages deal mainly with the relations of Tunisia and Morocco with France. It may be useful if I give their gist in this covering memorandum.

Mr. Beaulieu mentioned that the arrest of the five Algerian leaders had struck a very severe blow to French prestige in that area and that it had, for the time being, destroyed the trust of Tunisia and Morocco in the French Government.

The presence of the French Army, which is regarded by the Tunisian and Moroccan Governments somewhat as an army of occupation, gives rise to a very difficult problem. On the one hand the French claim that these forces are necessary to protect the interests and lives of the European population, an argument which the recent events in Meknes would tend to confirm; on the other hand the Moroccan and Tunisian Government's believe — and the Mission gave this some credence — that they themselves could ensure internal security if only French troop movements were not inciting villagers to hostile acts.

In connection with the role which Canada might play in the area, Mr. Beaulieu also mentioned that because we have no colonialist objectives we might be useful as mediators in eventual discussions on the future status of the foreign military bases in Morocco and Tunisia.

Rapport préliminaire

Preliminary Report

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], December 14, 1956

SUMMARY OF THE PRELIMINARY REPORT OF THE CANADIAN MISSION TO MOROCCO AND TUNISIA

The Canadian Mission to Morocco and Tunisia was headed by Mr. Paul Beaulieu of this Department. Mr. Campbell Smith represented the Department of Trade and Commerce and Mr. Brunet, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

1. General Impressions

The Mission was given a warm welcome by the Moroccan and Tunisian Governments who were gratified that Canada, by sending a Mission, was giving some practical recognition to their new independence. Notwithstanding the tense internal situation in the two countries, especially after the spectacular arrest of the five Algerian leaders which made contacts with the local authorities and frank discussions of delicate problems difficult, it was considered the Mission was, on the whole, useful and successful. Its task was greatly facilitated by United Kingdom, United States and, above all, French Missions in the area.

2. Internal Situation

Both countries were fortunate that when granted their independence they had leaders of a stature to take over from the French. The Sultan of Morocco and Mr. Bourguiba are generally regarded as restraining extremist factions in their countries and as staunch supporters of the West. Most of the Ministers, particularly those in Morocco, made a very favorable impression. They were well aware of the difficult task, particularly in the economic field, which faces their Governments and they are seriously endeavoring to tackle the most urgent and basic problems. However, their whole thinking is primarily dominated by political considerations and one feels that sometimes difficulties with the French authorities are exploited to distract attention from unsolved internal problems. A disquieting aspect of the political life in both countries is the strong tendency to one-party rule. This carries over into the administrative field where appointments are too often based upon political affiliations. The Mission was, nevertheless, impressed by the intelligence and sense of responsibility of the administrators who are undertaking a difficult task in assuming responsibility from the French who formerly had 30,000 civil servants in Morocco alone. The present policy is to keep as many French technicians as possible in the capacity of advisors. However, there is strong pressure on the Government from ambitious young men who have in the past been denied access by the French to posts of responsibility. This internal situation is greatly influenced by international considerations; the whole policy of both Governments is conditioned by the Algerian problem and the recent turn of events in Egypt. The French handling of these problems has been used by critics as proof that it has not abandoned its colonial aims in Morocco and Tunisia.

3. Relations with France

Unlike most newly autonomous countries, Morocco and Tunisia have not exhibited a hypersensitivity about their sovereignty and instead appear very conscious of the importance of maintaining close intellectual, political and economic ties with France. Nevertheless, the arrest of the Algerian leaders definitely wounded the pride of the Moroccans and Tunisians. It is clear that the first step towards improving relations is to restore the climate of mutual confidence. The decision of the French Government to send Mr. Seydoux and Mr. Basdevant on special missions with extraordinary powers is a move in the right direction. It is essential that the French authorities in Paris realize that the granting of independence has created a new situation and that they no longer enjoy their old privileged status in the former protectorates.

Both Governments agree that certain foreign forces are required to meet the possible threats from outside their borders, but they wish to see a new type of relationship established between their own army and those foreign forces, possibly within the framework of some regional defence organization. Their good faith has been shown in the moderate attitude they have maintained with regard to foreign bases such as the U.S. air base in Morocco and the French naval base at Bizerte. The French have agreed to re-negotiate the defence agreements and it is hoped that they will be able to meet, to some extent, the Moroccan and Tunisian viewpoint.

4. Relations with the U.S.

The U.S. authorities have shown increased interest in these two countries since their independence, mainly because of the presence of vital U.S. bases (SAC) in Morocco, and of the strategic importance of Tunisia. They recognize, however, the anomaly of their position since they hold these bases by agreement with the French, not with the local governments. American diplomats on the spot favor a policy of economic aid to the two countries, a policy discounted by the U.S. Embassy in Paris. There are indications that the Moroccan Government would accept financial assistance in the form of payments for the use of U.S. bases.

5. Orientation of Policy

The Ministers met by the Mission stressed the fact that the future of their countries was linked with the West, not only because of intellectual ties, but also because the West could assure the development of their countries in an atmosphere of freedom. Communism, even within the trade unions, is negligible but could mushroom if the internal situation were to deteriorate. The present leaders have little sympathy for Nasser because of his dictatorial position and his truculence towards certain Western powers. The Arab League is not highly regarded because it has not achieved any worthwhile purpose. There is a possibility, however, of the evolution of a North African federation which would include Algeria; this is a project favored by Mr. Bourguiba. If the friendship and the independence of this region is to be strengthened it is essential that the West undertake a more active policy of economic assistance; this is a burden which France may not be willing to bear alone indefinitely, especially in view of the avowed policy of Morocco and Tunisia to work for the independence of Algeria.

6. Immigration

(This section of the report is to be revised by Mr. Brunet).

In all conversations reference was made to the future of French colons and fonctionnaires. Both Governments, but especially the Moroccan, are anxious to keep qualified technicians and wish to avoid the unfavorable impression a massive emigration would create. It would not appear indicated to send immigration teams. On the other hand, local French officials realize the urgent need to meet numerous demands of Frenchmen for repatriation. Reportedly authorities in Paris are now contemplating financial assistance to such repatriates. As concerns Frenchmen wishing to emigrate to Canada, our Immigration Office in Paris is considering what administrative relief could be given to the British offices in North Africa.

7. Trade

(This section of the report is to be completed by Mr. Campbell Smith).

Local authorities are anxious to increase exports in order to balance trade but in view of the limited range of competitive commodities they could offer to Canada, our Mission was unable to give much encouragement to them. To build strong, stabilized national economies, production and agriculture in each of the two countries will have to be diversified and large areas of land will have to be reclaimed to meet the needs of the agrarian population. They expressed more interest in increased private investment in their countries rather than economic aid. Both Governments are convinced that their countries should remain in the "zone franc" although they would like some arrangement whereby they could better protect local industries. (Other reports have indicated that Tunisian authorities are under the impression that a request was made for economic assistance from Canada).

8. Diplomatic Relations

Canadian diplomatic Missions would be welcome in the two countries but both would find it difficult at present to make personnel available for posting to Canada. The Tunisians mentioned the possibility of dual accreditation of their Ambassador in Washington. Our Mission did not consider that priority should be given to the opening of Missions in Tunisia and Morocco. It felt, however, that Canada could play a useful role in Morocco and Tunisia. Our own evolution within the Commonwealth serves as an example and our initiative in the establishing of a U.N. force for Egypt has made a favorable impression. Our agricultural experts could advise on reclamation projects; Moroccan and Tunisian students could pursue advanced studies in French-Canadian universities.

9. Conclusions

Tunisia and Morocco will require moral and economic support from the West if they are to maintain their orientation towards us. France is in the best position to assist the two countries and to encourage them in their orientation to the West. The differences of policy which at present separate France and the two North African countries may, if they go unresolved, lead to a deterioration in this relationship. In that event it will be difficult for the French Government to continue to bear the full burden of financial assistance to that region. We should, therefore, plan with a view to relieving France of part of her burden thus checking any communist initiative to take over France's role in this area. A stand must be taken now if the West wants to counteract the Egyptians in their efforts to win these two new states and if we wish to prevent the infiltration of communism.

Le président d'Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited au ministre du Commerce

President, Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited to Minister of Trade and Commerce

SECRET Ottawa, January 16, 1956

Dear Mr. Howe,

This letter will confirm our discussion of recent date regarding the following items:

(a) Amendment of Beaverlodge Contract

You will recall that the contract covering Beaverlodge production signed in December, 1953, provided for payment as follows:

(1) For actual costs of production for the period up to August 31st, 1955, these costs to include direct mine costs, administration and Head Office charges.

(2) A fixed allowance for amortization of $4.25 per pound of uranium produced.

(3) A fixed rate of profit of $1.50 per pound of uranium produced.

The contract provided further that on the completion of the cost period a fixed price would be negotiated, which price would take into account cost experience during the cost period and estimated costs for the balance of the contract. The contract also provided that Eldorado would make every effort to expand production and for this purpose would carry out an intensive exploration and underground development programme. As a result of this programme, the ore reserves were increased to the point where it was possible to plan an increase in production from the initial rate of 500 tons per day to a rate of 2,000 tons per day. The proposed expansion was discussed with the United States Atomic Energy Commission in June, 1955. The Commission expressed its wish that Eldorado should proceed with the expansion and undertook to purchase the increased production. This undertaking was contained in a Letter of Intent received from Jesse Johnson, Director of the Division of Raw Materials, under date of July 28th, 1955, a copy of which I sent to you under date of August 3rd, 1955.

It was not possible in June, 1955, to negotiate a firm price for the increased production, since at that time estimates of the necessary preproduction and capital expenditures were not available. It was agreed, therefore, that the price would be negotiated later in the year but that the price would not exceed $10.50 per pound. As I explained to you in my letter of August 3rd, 1955, we were satisfied that a ceiling of $10.50 per pound would give us plenty of leeway.

In December last we began negotiations on the amended contract. We took the position that Eldorado should be entitled to the price which would result from the application of the special price formula which is being used in connection with the purchase of uranium from private producers. On this basis the price would be $10.50 per pound. The Commission argued that credit should be allowed for the fact that the Commission had shared to some extent in the risks involved in the early stages of the project and a price of $9.50 per pound was proposed. After considerable discussion, it was agreed to split the difference and to write the contract at a price of $10.00 per pound, f.o.b. Beaverlodge. At the completion of the cost period — that is, at August 31st, 1955 — Eldorado had delivered 1,962,292 pounds. It is estimated that 14,865,175 pounds will be delivered during the balance of the contract — that is, from August 31st, 1955, to March 31st, 1962. It is estimated that the profit from the entire production after the amortization of preproduction and capital expenditures — i.e., $38,930,011 — will be $31,602,950.

(b) Amendment of Port Radium Contract

On the basis of our present estimates, the Port Radium property will be mined out by the end of 1958. There was on hand as at December 31st, 1955, 1,144,473 pounds which was not covered by contract. It is estimated that production between January 1st, 1956, and December 31st, 1958, will amount to 2,005,527 pounds. It was agreed that a contract would be entered into for 3,150,000 pounds at a price of $10.50 per pound, f.o.b. Port Radium. While this represents a considerable reduction below the previous price, for reasons which I explained to you it was considered advisable that a reduction in price should be offered. It is estimated that this contract will result in a profit of approximately $15,000,000 after depreciation.

(c) Refining Contract

As you are aware, the new refining process at Port Hope went into operation last June. The product of the new process is an orange oxide of a purity to permit its direct entry to a metal plant, as contrasted with the product of the old process which required further refining and purification before conversion to metal. Apart from the improvement in the specifications of the product, the new process also enables us to obtain recoveries in excess of 99% as against recoveries of approximately 90% in the old process. Since volume is the important factor in operating costs, when plans for the new process were under consideration it was decided to design for sufficient capacity to treat all of the Canadian production then in sight. In other words, the operation would not have been economic had it been based solely on the treatment of Eldorado concentrates. The new plant has a capacity for producing 3,300 tons of orange oxide per annum. To maintain the plant at full capacity will require production from Eldorado's properties, the Pronto and Gunnar properties, and some part of the production from the Algom property. While deliveries of orange oxide began last June, it was not considered desirable that a refining contract should be negotiated until at least six months' operating and cost experience was available. On the basis of this experience, a refining fee of 72¢ per pound of U_3O_8 contained in orange oxide was established. This figure covered operating cost, full depreciation over the period from June 1955 to June 1962, research and development cost including the amortization of the new research and development building and equipment, and a profit of 16¢ per pound. I advised you at our meeting that this refining fee appeared acceptable to the Commission. In subsequent discussion it has been suggested by the Commission that a longer period should be allowed for amortization, with a "bail-out" provision in the event that the plant does not operate for the entire period allowed for its amortization. I have advised the Commission that we would take this proposal under consideration. The suggested period of amortization — i.e., ten years — would have the effect of reducing the refining fee by approximately 5¢ per pound. On the basis of a refining fee of 72¢ per pound, the estimated profit on the contract after depreciation would be $6,500,000. If the refining fee is reduced to 67¢ per pound, the estimated profit would be $4,400,000.

A Letter of Intent has now been received from the Commission confirming the agreement described above with respect to the Beaverlodge and Port Radium contracts. The letter also accepts our proposal on the refining fee, subject to further discussion as to the possibility of increasing the period of amortization. While it is my hope that we can maintain our present position with respect to the refining fee, it may be necessary to give some ground on the question of amortization. I will keep you advised of developments in this connection.

Yours sincerely,
W.J. BENNETT

SECRET Ottawa, March 15, 1956

Dear Mr. Howe,

Further to our exchange of correspondence and our discussions regarding contracts with the United States Atomic Energy Commission for (a) Port Radium production, (b) Beaverlodge production and (c) refining, I am now able to advise you that final agreement has been reached on these contracts and that the contracts have been signed by Eldorado. I would expect that the Commission would sign the contracts within the next week or so. There is no change in the terms of the Beaverlodge and Port Radium contracts as I have described them to you in previous correspondence.

With respect to the refining contract, you will recall my pointing out in my letter of January 16th that the Commission had requested that we provide for a longer period of amortization. The specific proposal involved a reduction in price from 72¢ per pound to 67¢ per pound. We accepted the proposal, subject to a condition that the Commission would reimburse Eldorado for the unamortized portion of its capital expenditure in the event that the contract is terminated prior to the completion of a full write-off. The refining contract contains a provision setting out this understanding in terms acceptable to Eldorado. The total payment involved in the three contracts is $247,342,897. Of this amount, $29,953,448.25 has already been paid.

Yours sincerely,
W.J. BENNETT

SECRET Ottawa, May 14, 1956

Dear Mr. Howe,

Further to our conversation of Saturday last, I am attaching a memorandum on the uranium situation which has been prepared for your use in Cabinet. In accordance with the advice received from your office this morning, this memorandum has been prepared in a form suitable for distribution to the Cabinet.

I have made no reference in the memorandum to the proposed change in the U.S. domestic buying programme since I have been asked to treat this information in the strictest confidence.

Yours sincerely,

W.J. BENNETT

P.S. Since dictating the above, a letter† has been received from Jesse Johnson confirming the U.S. proposals outlined in the memorandum, a copy of which is attached.

Memorandum

URANIUM PURCHASING POLICY

1. Arrangements covering the supplying of uranium to the United States were first entered into in 1942. These arrangements have been continued during the post-war years. Initially, the arrangements covered the purchase of uranium produced by Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited. In March, 1948, the arrangements were extended to include the purchase of uranium from other producers.

2. The arrangements with respect to the purchase of uranium from private producers by Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, the Government's designated procurement agent, take two forms:

(a) Purchases which Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited may make under the published price schedule. This schedule was first published on March 12th, 1948. Revisions have been announced from time to time both with respect to price and the period of guaranteed market.

(b) Purchases which Eldorado may make under a special price formula which was established in consultation with the United States Atomic Energy Commission on December 10th, 1953.

(c) The termination date for deliveries under both arrangements is March 31st, 1962.

3. All purchases made to date have been made under the special price formula, and it is anticipated that all future purchases will be made under this formula. The arrangement as between Eldorado and the United States Atomic Energy Commission with respect to such purchases is as follows. Eldorado obtains a Letter of Intent from the U.S.A.E.C. prior to the execution of a contract with the producer. In each case Eldorado's contract with the producer is covered by a contract between Eldorado and the U.S.A.E.C.

4. When the arrangement covering purchases under the special price formula was entered into in December, 1953, no limitation was placed on the amount of uranium which the U.S.A.E.C. would purchase. In July, 1955, it was decided that the U.S.A.E.C. should be requested to make a firm commitment as to quantity, inasmuch as Eldorado had incurred at that time obligations to Canadian producers in the total amount of $337,000,000, and it appeared probable that further substantial obligations would be incurred — primarily because of new discoveries in the Blind River area. Moreover, it seemed desirable to advise the Canadian public as to the limitation with regard to purchases under the special price formula if, in fact, such limitation existed.[1]

5. While the U.S.A.E.C. indicated its desire to establish such a limitation, it was reluctant to have the limitation expressed in quantitative terms because of security provisions. Accordingly, it was agreed in July, 1955, that the U.S.A.E.C. commitment to purchase uranium which Eldorado might purchase under the special price formula would be limited as follows:

(a) Contracts should be negotiated on or before March 31st, 1956,

(b) There should be definite assurance that production would commence on or before April 1st, 1957.

This limitation with respect to purchases under the special price formula was announced by The Right Honourable C.D. Howe on August 3rd, 1955.[2] On that date it was estimated that Eldorado would incur further obligations in the amount of $663,000,000 — or a total obligation of $1,000,000,000.

6. In September, 1955, the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority advised Eldorado of its desire to purchase uranium in Canada in the following amounts:

(a) 2,500 tons to be delivered in the period up to March 31st, 1962; deliveries to commence in 1958 or earlier if possible.

(b) 5,000 tons to be delivered in the period from March 31st, 1962, to March 31st, 1967; deliveries to be at the rate of 1,000 tons per year.

7. In view of Eldorado's arrangements with the U.S.A.E.C., Eldorado advised the U.K.A.E.A. that the question of supplying Canadian uranium to the United Kingdom should be discussed at a tripartite meeting. At a tripartite meeting held in Washington in October, 1955, Eldorado advised the U.S.A.E.C. of Canada's interest in developing civil markets for uranium, particularly in the United Kingdom, and proposed that the U.K. requirement should be met by a diversion from the quantities which would be offered to the U.S.A.E.C. under the current arrangement between Eldorado and the Commission. The U.S.A.E.C. was sympathetic to this proposal but suggested that a decision be deferred until March 31st, 1956, at which time Eldorado would be in a better position to estimate the production which would be available beyond existing contracts.

[2] Voir/See Volume 21, Document 459.

8. In December, 1955, it became apparent that certain of the potential producers would be unable to meet the production deadline of April 1st, 1957. In accordance with Eldorado's usual practice of keeping the U.S.A.E.C. informed of production estimates, the Commission was advised of this situation. At the time Eldorado's commitments, either in the form of contracts or Letters of Intent, amounted to $701,382,300.

9. In February, 1956, the U.S.A.E.C. proposed the following amendment of its arrangement with Eldorado covering purchases under the special price formula:

(a) Eldorado would continue to receive applications for special price contracts up to and including March 31st, 1956. On or shortly after that date Eldorado would notify those applicants which were considered to be eligible for the negotiation of contracts. In making the selection, the following criteria would be used:

(i) There must be satisfactory evidence that the applicant had an economic orebody.

(ii) There must be definite assurance that the property could be brought into production not later than September 30th, 1957.

There would be no change in the provision regarding the termination date for deliveries. Deliveries under all contracts must be completed by March 31st, 1962.

10. Agreement was reached on this proposal in late February and The Right Honourable C.D. Howe announced the modifications of the special price arrangement in the House of Commons on March 2nd, 1956.[3]

11. On the basis of information available in February, it was estimated that Eldorado's total commitment under the modified arrangement would amount to $1,080,000,000.

12. At a tripartite meeting held in Washington on May 3rd, 1956, for the purpose of discussing arrangements relative to the U.K. requirement, the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority indicated its desire to increase its supply from Canada in the period through March 31st, 1962, from 2,500 tons to 5,500 tons. The U.S.A.E.C. was reluctant to have the increased U.K. requirement diverted from quantities which would be offered to the Commission under the current arrangement with Eldorado, and proposed that Eldorado should explore the possibility of increasing the total amount of uranium which could be made available under the existing special price arrangement. At the same time, the U.S.A.E.C. indicated its desire to establish minimum and maximum quantities which it would be prepared to purchase under the special price arrangement. These figures were 68,000 tons and 71,000 tons respectively. Eldorado advised the meeting that the total quantity could be increased by increasing the mining and concentrating capacities of certain of the applicants for contracts. It was made clear, however, that since such an arrangement would have the effect of increasing Eldorado's total obligation to approximately $1,386,000,000, the approval of the Government of Canada would be required. In the event that the proposed increase is acceptable to the Government of Canada, the U.S.A.E.C. was prepared to agree that the total U.K. requirement might be met by diversion from quantities which would be offered to the U.S.A.E.C.

13. There were also discussed with the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority the contractual arrangements which would be made with regard to its requirement. It was agreed, subject to the approval of the Government of Canada, that Eldorado would enter into a contract with the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority under which it would undertake to supply 5,500 tons of uranium through the period up to March 31st, 1962, deliveries to commence in mid-1958 or at the beginning of 1959. The quantities involved would be supplied from the mines remaining to be put under contract; the allocation as between these mines would be at Eldorado's discretion. It is estimated that the gross dollar value of the uranium to be supplied to the U.K. under this arrangement will be between $110,000,000 and $115,000,000. A firm estimate cannot be given until contract prices have been negotiated.

See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1956, Volume II, p. 1739.

14. There was also discussed with the U.K.A.E.A. a proposal whereby the U.K.A.E.A. would have an option to purchase an additional amount of uranium in the period from March 31st, 1962, to March 31st, 1965, in the amount of 7,500 tons.

Bearing in mind Canada's interest in maintaining markets for uranium beyond March 31st, 1962, it was agreed, subject to the approval of the Government of Canada, that the contract between Eldorado and the U.K.A.E.A. would contain an option clause covering additional quantities in the amount of 7,500 tons.

15. At the tripartite meeting Eldorado raised the question of Canada's position with respect to requests for the supply of uranium which had been, or might be, received from other friendly countries. While Canada was fully aware of the desirability of marketing uranium within an acceptable international framework such as would be provided by the International Agency for Atomic Energy, it might be necessary to adopt an interim policy pending the establishment of the Agency or some other appropriate supra-national authority. More specifically, it was considered advisable that arrangements should be made to supply small requirements of uranium for research programmes under suitable bilateral agreements. The U.S.A.E.C. expressed its agreement with Canada's position and proposed that such quantities might be diverted from the total quantity which Eldorado would purchase under the existing special price arrangement with the U.S.A.E.C. up to 200 tons per annum.

URANIUM; PURCHASING POLICY

30. Mr. Howe, as Chairman of the Privy Council Committee on Scientific and Industrial Research, said he had estimated in February this year that under the modified arrangements for special price purchases of uranium by Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited, for delivery to the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission, the estimated total commitment of Eldorado would amount to about $1,080 million.

During recent tripartite meetings in Washington the U.K. Atomic Energy Authority had indicated a desire to purchase uranium from Eldorado for delivery up to 1967. It had been thought that the quantities required might be diverted from deliveries to the U.S.A.E.C. under current arrangements.

The commission had now established the minimum and maximum quantities of uranium it was prepared to purchase and had suggested the possibility of increasing the total amount of uranium available from Canada under the special arrangements so as to take care of U.K. requirements as well as their own. Eldorado considered that the total could be increased by enlarging the mining and concentrating capacities of certain applicants for contracts under the purchasing arrangements with the company. This would probably increase Eldorado's total purchase commitments under the special price formula to $1,386 million which would be covered by firm contracts with the U.S. and U.K. authorities.

If this proposal were approved by Canada, the U.S.A.E.C. would agree to the total U.K. requirements being met by deliveries from the quantities of uranium offered to the U.S.

The proposed contract with the U.K.A.E.A. would provide for deliveries beginning in mid-1958 or January 1959, and would contain an option clause covering additional purchases after March 31st, 1962. This was very desirable in view of the interest of Canada in maintaining markets for uranium beyond that date. It was contemplated that the quantities required would be supplied from several mines under contract to produce supplies for the U.S., with allocation at the discretion of Eldorado. The estimated gross dollar value of deliveries to the U.K. would be between $110 or $115 million.

31. During the course of discussion the following points were made:

(a) The proposal would extend the output of certain uranium mines but not the termination date of March 31st, 1962, after which Eldorado was not obligated to accept deliveries under contracts with private producers. There were good potential mines available and, if they could get into production by September of next year, Eldorado could take care of this extra output.

(b) The U.K. was in desperate need of uranium. It was very desirable to supply what they required. However, this would channel their dollar reserves into uranium purchases at the possible expense of other exports from Canada. This was a risk that had to be taken and anything that would assist the U.K. in developing power was useful, as the import of coal was crippling the U.K. economy. Atomic plants had been built but fuel was needed for them.

(c) If Canada did not get into the British market now, other countries would be in on the ground floor when Canada might wish to export uranium. So far, Canadian production was the cheapest in the world because of the big deposits of ore which allowed economic organizations to be set up.

32. The Cabinet noted the report of the Chairman of the Privy Council Committee on Scientific and Industrial Research and agreed that tripartite arrangements be entered into with the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission and the U.K. Atomic Energy Authority for the sale to the Authority by Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited of uranium produced in Canada, in quantities sufficient to meet the requirements of the authority; such additional amounts to be met by increasing the production of uranium purchases by Eldorado, and the amounts to be diverted from the quantities of uranium offered to the U.S.A.E.C.

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, December 17, 1956

Dear Mr. Howe,

At our last meeting I advised you that I had written to Jesse Johnson with regard to the post-1962 uranium situation. A copy of my letter is enclosed.

Arrangements have now been made to discuss this question at a meeting in Washington on January 9th. I will keep you advised of developments.

Le président d'Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited
au directeur des opérations des matières premières,
United States Atomic Energy Commission

President, Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited to Director, Raw Materials Operations,
United States Atomic Energy Commission

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, November 21, 1956

Dear Mr. Johnson,

You wrote me under date of September 28th, 1956,† in confirmation of the decisions reached at our meetings in Washington on September 27th and 28th, in which representatives of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority also participated. These discussions were arranged because it seemed evident to Eldorado that despite the amendment to the special price arrangement which was agreed to in August, 1956, and the details of which were set out in R. Faulkner's letter of August 10th, 1956,† certain Canadian producers would still be unable to get into production owing to difficulties in arranging financing. The situation had reached the point where Eldorado considered that it would be unable to meet its minimum delivery commitment to the United States Atomic Energy Commission — i.e., 67,000 tons over the period up to March 31st, 1962 — and at the same time undertake the delivery of 5,500 tons to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority over the same period.

In a letter written under date of September 4th† I advised you that in my opinion the financing difficulties of these producers could only be overcome if Eldorado amended its special price arrangement as follows:

(a) To increase the quantity of the contracts by an amount sufficient to provide for a full write-off of preproduction and capital expenses, applying the amortization factor which was used in the calculation of the original contract price.

(b) To extend the delivery period to March 31st, 1963.

(c) The price to be paid for deliveries after March 31st, 1962, to be the original contract price or $8.00 per pound plus the amortization factor — whichever is the lower.

In your letter of September 28th† you set forth the conditions under which the Commission would be prepared to agree to a modification of the special price arrangement as proposed above. R.J. Henry wrote you under date of October 18th† advising you that these conditions were acceptable to Eldorado. At our meeting in Washington on November 8th Mr. Henry and I advised you that in our view the modification of the special price arrangement would achieve the desired objective — namely, that of ensuring that Canadian production in the period up to March 31st, 1962, would be sufficient to meet our minimum delivery commitment to the USAEC and our delivery commitment to the UKAEA.

There were two questions which were left unresolved at the tripartite meeting in Washington on September 27th and 28th, as follows -

(a) The division as between the USAEC and the UKAEA of the extra production (now estimated at 6,000 tons) which is likely to become available by reason of the revision of the special price arrangement referred to above. It is probable that the bulk of this production will be delivered in the period between March 31st, 1962, and March 31st, 1963,

(b) The action to be taken on the request of the UKAEA for supplies of uranium from Canada during the period March 31st, 1962, through March 31st, 1967, exclusive of those quantities referred to in (a) which may be delivered subsequent to March 31st, 1962. In this connection you will recall that the UKAEA wishes to purchase 3,000 tons per annum over the period up to March 31st, 1967, and has indicated its desire to obtain an option on a further quantity of 1,500 tons per annum over the same period. I assume that if agreement can be reached as to the division between the Commission and the UKAEA of the 6,000 tons referred to in (a) above, the amount allocated to the UKAEA would constitute part or all of the 3,000 ton per annum requirement during the first year of the five-year period subsequent to March 31st, 1962.

You will recall that it was considered advisable to defer a decision on these two questions until such time as the supply situation in the period up to March 31st, 1962, had been clarified. With the assurance that we will now be in a position to meet our minimum commitment to the Commission and our commitment to the UKAEA through the period up to March 31st, 1962, I consider it most desirable that we should now endeavour to resolve these two questions and at as early a date as possible. As you are aware, the negotiation of the contract between Eldorado and the UKAEA covering the supply of 5,500 tons in the period up to March 31st, 1962, has been under way for some months. All items in the contract have been settled with the exception of items (a) and (b) referred to above. The UKAEA has asked for the inclusion of a clause covering these two items, with the full understanding that this must involve agreement on a tripartite basis. For obvious reasons we are anxious to complete the negotiation of the UKAEA contract.

It is my impression that there should not be too much difficulty with respect to the allocation as between the USAEC and the UKAEA of the additional production which is likely to become available in the period between March 31st, 1962, and March 31st, 1963, by reason of the recent revision of the special price arrangement. However, I recognize that a decision as to the allocation of Canadian production which will become available following the termination of existing contracts may present a more difficult problem.

The Commission is already aware of Canada's interest in supplying some part of the UKAEA current and future requirements of uranium for its civil programme. In this letter I wish to offer some general comments on the situation with respect to the possible extension of existing or proposed contracts. For the most part, these comments will confirm statements I have made to you over the past year.

From the outset of our relations with the Commission we have recognized that the Commission should have a prior call on Canadian production which will be available after the termination of existing contracts. This recognition is reflected in the options contained in Eldorado's contracts with the producer and in Eldorado's contracts with the Commission. As you are aware, this option now takes two forms. In contracts with the following companies -

Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited
Algom Uranium Mines Limited
Bicroft Uranium Mines Limited
Faraday Uranium Mines Limited
Rayrock Mines Limited

the option reads as follows:

"If at or shortly prior to expiration of the contract term or if upon completion of deliveries hereunder, there remain ore reserves available to the Producer for treatment in the Producer's mill after such expiration or completion, then upon written request by Eldorado the parties shall in good faith negotiate for an extension of the contract term and at prices that are mutually acceptable, taking into account the fact that the unit price specified in this agreement includes full amortization of the estimated capital cost of the required production facilities, assuming delivery of the total quantity of U_3O_8 in concentrates specified herein."

Gunnar Mines Limited and Pronto Uranium Mines Limited have agreed to the inclusion of this option in any amendment to their contracts.

In existing or proposed contracts with the following companies -

Lorado Uranium Mines Limited
Consolidated Denison Mines Limited
Can-Met Explorations Limited
Northspan Uranium Mines Limited
Stanrock Uranium Mines Limited
Stanleigh Uranium Mining Corporation Limited
Milliken Lake Uranium Mines Limited
Dyno Mines Limited
Cavendish Uranium and Mining Company Limited
Greyhawk Uranium Mines Limited
Rexspar Uranium & Metals Mining Company Limited

the option reads as follows -

"Notwithstanding anything contained herein, Eldorado shall have an option to be exercised on or before March 31st, 1961, to extend the contract and to purchase a quantity of U_3O_8 in concentrates thereunder not in excess of an amount determined by multiplying _____ pounds by a number of days between the date of completion of deliveries of _____ pounds or March 31st, 1963, whichever is earlier, and December 31st, 1966. The exercise of this option shall be accomplished by a written notice from Eldorado to the Producer which shall specify the additional quantity of material to be purchased, the period of the contract extension, and any other variations from the terms and conditions of the contract herein stipulated in connection with the exercise of the option. In the event that this option is exercised, deliveries will be at an approximate rate of _____ pounds per month and shall be completed on a date specified in such notice which shall be not later than December 31st, 1966, it being understood that the contract shall be extended by a period sufficient to allow completion of deliveries at said monthly rate. In such event, the price per pound to be paid by Eldorado for U_3O_8 in concentrates meeting the specifications of the United States Atomic Energy Commission under its domestic uranium concentrate procurement programme announced May 24th, 1956, shall be the price in U.S. currency which the United States Atomic Energy Commission guarantees under the said programme to domestic producers for similar purchases, as reflected in contracts being executed at April 1st, 1962, and shall be payable in U.S. funds, it being understood that if such contracts normally contain provision to allow the producers generally to benefit from possible subsequent increases in the said guaranteed price, a similar provision will be included in the contract extension with the Producer made by the exercise of this option. For concentrates failing to meet these specifications, there shall be an appropriate price adjustment. All the provisions hereof shall apply so far as applicable and with all necessary changes in respect of concentrates delivered pursuant to the exercise by Eldorado of the option provided for in this Article."

It will be noted that in the option for the first group of producers there is no requirement as to the date on which the option must be exercised, the price to be paid, or the period during which deliveries will be accepted; whereas the second option is specific on these three points. At our recent meeting in Washington I pointed out that we might receive requests from the first group of producers for an amendment of the option clause, to bring it into line with the option clause contained in the contracts of the second group of producers. It was agreed that if such requests were received Eldorado would amend the option clause accordingly. Apart from this difference in the option clauses, they have this common feature — the extension of contracts is entirely at the buyer's option. This in itself is an acceptable arrangement, providing that the buyer is able to declare his intention with respect to the options in sufficient time to enable the producer to find other markets in the event that the options are not exercised. As I have pointed out, no specific date has been established for the exercise of the first option, although the language suggests that no action need be taken until deliveries under existing contracts have been completed. Deliveries under the contracts containing this option are likely to be completed in the period January 1st, 1961, to March 31st, 1962. The second option is specific as regards the date of its exercise — namely, March 31st, 1961. It is our considered opinion that it would be unrealistic to expect that no action need be taken on these options until deliveries have been completed under existing contracts in the case of the first option, and until March 31st, 1961, in the case of the second option. We must anticipate that Eldorado will be under increasing pressure to declare its position with regard to the exercise of these options. This pressure will be caused by three things -

(1) The fact that Canada's domestic requirements over the period of the next twenty-five years will take up only a small part of the projected production of uranium in Canada. On the basis of the most optimistic forecast as to the role of nuclear power in Canada, the requirement for uranium is not likely to exceed 2,000 tons per annum as late as 1980. Consequently, if Canadian production is to be maintained in the period beyond March 31st, 1962, export sales must provide the market.

(2) The knowledge that other buyers may be prepared to go firm for quantities in the period beyond March 31st, 1962. The requirement of the UKAEA in the period March 31st, 1962, to March 31st, 1967, is a case in point. Approaches have already been received from other governments and, while the immediate requirements are not large, they may be expected to increase as the civil programmes in these countries expand. As we now see the situation, the immediate requirements of countries other than the United Kingdom and the United States with which Canada would be prepared to enter into bilateral agreements, can be met from the diversion of 200 tons per annum which has been agreed to in your letter of May 14th. However, we have already been advised that these countries will be interested in obtaining larger quantities if such quantities can be made available after 1962. The large-scale development of the civil uses of atomic energy in these countries is contingent on the availability of uranium. It may be assumed, as has already happened in the case of the United Kingdom, that individual countries will wish to obtain a firm commitment as regards uranium supplies some time in advance of the need for these supplies. This means simply that if a supplier is unable to give a firm commitment, the country will seek its supplies elsewhere.

(3) The realization that every effort is being made to expand production in the United States. While I understand that the Commission's objective in extending its buying programme to March 31st, 1966, was primarily to ensure that an appropriate level of production would be maintained in the United States beyond March 31st, 1962, there is nothing in the current policy apart from the restriction on the total quantity which may be purchased from any one company that would put a ceiling on total production in the United States in the period March 31st, 1962, to December 31st, 1966. Consequently, we cannot overlook the possibility that the level of production in that period may be such as to cause a cessation or a substantial reduction in the Commission's demand on Canadian sources. In this connection I should point out that we have no information on current rates of production in the United States or on projected rates of production through the period to March 31st, 1962, and through the period from March 31st, 1962, to December 31st, 1966. It is my view that if such information could be made available we would be in a better position to assess the Canadian situation in relation to the probable future U.S. demand on Canadian sources.

To sum up, the Government of Canada is very much concerned as to the position of Canadian producers following the termination of deliveries under existing contractual arrangements. Moreover, the Government of Canada recognizes that it has an obligation to ensure that these producers will have markets when their existing contracts expire. There is a full understanding of the difficulties which the Commission may encounter in any attempt to forecast the requirements from Canada beyond March 31st, 1962. On the other hand, the Commission will likewise understand the difficulties which the Government of Canada will undoubtedly encounter if no clarification is given to the producers as regards the exercise of options until 1961. For obvious reasons the Government of Canada does not wish to find itself in the position of having rejected firm offers from other buyers for production after March 31st, 1962, only to find that the Commission is not prepared to exercise its options.

I would appreciate an early opportunity of discussing with you and with the Commission, if necessary, the questions raised in this letter.

Yours sincerely,

[W.J. BENNETT]

Le président d'Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited au ministre du Commerce

President, Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited to Minister of Trade and Commerce

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, March 16, 1957

Dear Mr. Howe,

This will confirm our conversation of today's date regarding arrangements for the supply of uranium to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority.

Agreement has now been reached with the U.K.A.E.A. on the form and the content of the contract covering the supply of 5500 tons of uranium in the period July 1st, 1958, to March 31st, 1962. I expect that the contract will be signed before the end of next week. When the contract has been signed, we can arrange for an appropriate announcement. The U.K.A.E.A. has agreed that the approximate total dollar value of the contract may be given in the announcement. The figure will be approximate in as much as the deliveries will come from different mines which have different prices in their contracts. The rate at which delivery will be taken from a given mine has not yet been determined.

It had been our hope that we might also include in the contract a clause covering the U.K. requirement of 15,000 tons in the period March 31st, 1962, to December 31st, 1966. It had been anticipated that this quantity would be supplied from the quantities which would be available under the options in the existing contracts, in which case the U.S.A.E.C. would have had to agree to a diversion. However, the U.S.A.E.C. is not yet in a position to advise us that it is prepared to agree to such a diversion. The further development of ore reserves, particularly in the Blind River area, which has occurred in recent months, indicates clearly that Canadian production could be increased by an amount necessary to meet the U.K.A.E.A. requirement after 1962, even if the U.S.A.E.C. decides against the proposed diversion. This increase could be obtained by expanding the production capacity of some of the existing mines. There is a possibility that some part of it could be obtained without expanding production capacity since there is now evidence that some of the mines will be able to produce at rates in excess of the rates estimated at the time the contracts were negotiated. The quantities specified in the present options are based on the rates of production established in the contracts. In other words, the options do not cover any excess above these rates. In these circumstances, we are now able to give the U.K.A.E.A. an assurance that the 15,000 tons required after March 31st, 1962, can be supplied, even if the U.S.A.E.C. does not agree to a diversion from the quantities which it has under option. Subject to your approval, I propose to give the U.K.A.E.A. this assurance in a letter, a draft of which is attached.

The first two paragraphs of the letter concern the arrangements which will prevail in the event that the U.S.A.E.C. agrees to allocate to the U.K.A.E.A. some part of the additional production now contracted for, i.e. 6,000 tons, which will be available by reason of the recent modification of our special price formula. Whatever part of this quantity is allocated to the U.K.A.E.A. will form part of the 15,000-ton requirement of the U.K.A.E.A. in the post-1962 period. This is provided for in the final paragraph of the letter.

Paragraph three of the letter, page 2, sets out the respective commitments with regard to the 15,000-ton requirement, less whatever part of the requirement may be obtained from the 6,000-ton quantity referred to in the previous paragraph. You will note that the arrangement provides for sale from quantities under option, should the U.S.A.E.C. agree to a diversion, or from quantities yet to be contracted for, in the event that the U.S.A.E.C. does not agree to a diversion. In the first case, the price to be paid would be identical with that in the present options. In the second case, the price would have to be negotiated since we are not in a position to commit the producer on production which is not now under contract or under option. Moreover, the undertaking in the second case is based on the assumption that the Government of Canada, through its agent Eldorado, will be prepared to take whatever steps may be required for its implementation. While I do not believe that any problems will arise in this regard, we should recognize now the full implications of our undertaking, should we have to adopt the second course. While there is no financial commitment involved, there is an obligation to ensure availability.

As I advised you this morning, I would have preferred to delay making a commitment on the U.K.A.E.A. 15,000-ton requirement until the U.S.A.E.C. had advised us of its intentions with respect to its options. However, I have been concerned that if this decision were delayed too long, the U.K.A.E.A. might enter into arrangements with another supplier. This concern has been increased by the recent information I have obtained that the U.K.A.E.A. is negotiating for new production in the Union of South Africa. In these circumstances, I think it best that we should give the U.K.A.E.A. a definite assurance that we will be in a position to supply the desired quantity notwithstanding the action which the U.S.A.E.C. may take on its options.

Yours sincerely,

W.J. BENNETT

Projet d'une lettre du président d'Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited à la United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority

Draft Letter from President, Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited to United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority

By an agreement dated ___ between Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited and the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, Eldorado has agreed to sell and the Authority has agreed to purchase uranium concentrates having a total U_3O_8 content of 11,000,000 pounds for delivery in a period commencing on or before August 1st, 1958, and ending on March 31st, 1962. By an arrangement with the United States Atomic Energy Commission, this quantity is being diverted from quantities which the United States Atomic Energy Commission had contracted to purchase from Eldorado for delivery during the period ending March 31st, 1962.

Since the diversion referred to above was arranged the Commission has contracted to purchase an additional quantity of uranium concentrates containing approximately 12,000,000 pounds of U_3O_8 for delivery not later than March 31st, 1963. At the tripartite meeting held in Washington on September 27th, 1956, the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority indicated their desire to purchase some part of this additional quantity. It was agreed at that meeting that the allocation of this additional quantity as between the United States Atomic Energy Commission and the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority would be worked out later between the parties. In the event that agreement is reached whereby some portion of this additional quantity is allocated to and purchased by the Authority, Eldorado agrees to sell such portion to the Authority for delivery before March 31st, 1963, with deliveries to commence immediately following completion of deliveries of the 11,000,000 pounds referred to above. The price at which such portion will be sold will be the lesser of (a) the sum as listed for each Producer in paragraph 1 of Article II of the Eldorado-Authority Agreement of _____, or (b) the sum of Eight Dollars ($8.00) (U.S. funds) or such higher price as may be published by the United States Atomic Energy Commission in revision of its domestic programme announced May 24th, 1956, for U_3O_8 in concentrates as applicable to contemporaneous deliveries under the said programme, plus:

$2.41 (Canadian) if the concentrates are produced by Dyno Mines Limited, or substituted company

$2.70 (Canadian) if the concentrates are produced by Cavendish Uranium & Mining Company Limited, or substituted company

$2.73 (Canadian) if the concentrates are produced by Lorado Uranium Mines Limited

$2.12 (Canadian) if the concentrates are produced by Milliken Lake Uranium Mines Limited

$2.06 (Canadian) if the concentrates are produced by Stanrock Uranium Mines Limited

$2.25 (Canadian) if the concentrates are produced by Stanleigh Uranium Mining Corporation

$2.98 (Canadian) if the concentrates are produced by Rexspar Uranium Metals Mining Company Limited

[$2.98] (Canadian) if the concentrates are produced by Rayrock Mines Limited

$2.11 (Canadian) if the concentrates are produced by Northspan Uranium Mines Limited;

it being understood that, in order to determine which of the two prices referred to above is less, calculation of that part of the price which is payable in U.S. dollars shall be made on the basis of the arithmetical average of the Bank of Canada noon rates for U.S. exchange for the calendar month preceding the month in which payment is first made on account of each delivery.

Moreover, on the understanding that the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority undertake to purchase 30,000,000 pounds of U_3O_8 for delivery at an approximate rate of 1,600,000 pounds per quarter during the period April 1st, 1962, to December 31st, 1966, Eldorado for its part undertakes to sell this quantity for delivery as stated. In the event that all or part of this quantity can be supplied from production under option to Eldorado, the price will be identical with that provided for in the existing options and similarly payable in U.S. funds. In the event that some part of this 30,000,000 pounds is supplied from production capacity created under the existing contracts but from production nor under option at the date of this letter, or in the event that some part of the uranium is supplied from new production capacity, the price for such uranium will be negotiated.

In the event of deliveries being made to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority of any of the additional quantity referred to in paragraph 2 hereof, the quantities referred to in paragraph 3 hereof will be reduced by the amount of such deliveries.

Will you please confirm your acceptance of these arrangements.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], March 18, 1957

Dear Mr. Bennett,

Thanks for your confidential letter of March 16th, notifying me of the proposed arrangements for the supply of uranium to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority.

These proposed arrangements have my approval. You have explained to me that whether or not the United States Authority exercises its option in full, Canada will still be able to supply the 15,000 tons of uranium to the United Kingdom Authority in the period March 31st, 1962 to December 31st, 1966.

It will be in order for you to sign these agreements as far as the Government is concerned.

Dear Mr. Howe,

This letter is written in confirmation of our recent discussion regarding the advice I have received from the United States Atomic Energy Commission in the matter of the division of the additional 6,000 tons of uranium which will be available under existing contracts by reason of the modification of the special price arrangements.

I enclose copy of a letter I have received from the General Manager of the United States Atomic Energy Commission, from which you will note that the Commission is now prepared to allocate to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority 5,000 tons of the additional 6,000 tons which is expected to be delivered under existing contracts in the period March 31st, 1962, to March 31st, 1963. There is some possibility that a portion of the additional 6,000 tons may be delivered prior to March 31st, 1962. In this event, the USAEC has stipulated that the UKAEA will accept delivery of five-sixths of such amounts. This is a reasonable stipulation, since the revision of the special price arrangements may involve the payment of a lower price on deliveries which are made after March 31st, 1962.

At the present time the USAEC is committed to purchase the full 6,000 tons. If we accept the proposal of the USAEC, this commitments to the extent of 5,000 tons will be taken over by the UKAEA. The amount of money involved is approximately $105,000,000.

It is my understanding that the proposal has your approval and that I may advise the USAEC and the UKAEA accordingly.

Yours sincerely,
W.J. BENNETT

Le directeur général de la United States Atomic Energy Commission au président d'Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited

General Manager, United States Atomic Energy Commission, to President, Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited

Washington, April 9, 1957

Dear Mr. Bennett:

This is in reference to your letter of March 1, 1957,[4] regarding the possible diversion to the United Kingdom of a portion of the 6,000 tons U_3O_8 expected to be delivered under existing contracts in the period March 31, 1962-March 31, 1963. This subject was also discussed in your letter to me of January 24, 1957.[5] Subsequently we have on several occasions discussed the problem of releasing for sale to the U.K. uranium covered by our contracts and options with you.

As you have been informed, the Commission will not be in a position to make a decision on the release of uranium covered by its options for post-1962 production until there has been a detailed review of our potential requirements. This review is not expected to be completed for several months.

[4] Non retrouvée./Not located.
[5] Non retrouvée./Not located.

In the meantime, the Commission has considered the suggestion made in your letter of March 1 regarding the release of material expected to be available under existing contracts in the period March 31, 1962-March 31, 1963. This will confirm the information given you by Mr. Jesse Johnson in a telephone call last Friday, March 29.

The Commission has agreed to the sale by Canada to the U.K. of 5,000 tons U_3O_8 from the 6,000 tons expected to be delivered in the March 31, 1962-March 31, 1963 period as a result of certain contract revisions agreed upon last year. You will recall that the quantities deliverable under these contracts were increased and the final delivery dates extended to March 31, 1963 in order to allow a full five-year production period and facilitate financing the cost of bringing them into production.

We understand that there is a possibility that a certain portion of the 6,000 tons expected to be delivered between March 31, 1962, and March 31, 1963, might be delivered prior to March 31, 1962. In that event, some of the 5,000 tons released for sale to the U.K. would also be subject to delivery and acceptance by the U.K. prior to March 31, 1962. The foregoing arrangement is contingent, of course, on the AEC's receiving under its contracts with Eldorado a minimum of 68,000 tons U_3O_8 in the July 1, 1955 to March 31, 1962 period. Details of the 5,000-ton sale can be worked out in discussions which you propose to have with us in the near future.

With kind regards,

Sincerely yours
K.E. FIELDS

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], April 20, 1957

Dear Mr. Bennett,

Thanks for your letter of April 12th, to let me know that the United States Atomic Energy Commission has now agreed to the division of the uranium required for our United Kingdom commitment.

I assume that your contract with the United Kingdom for five thousand tons can be completed and announcement made shortly. I would advise making the U.K. contract for a firm five thousand tons, regardless of the contingency mentioned in your letter.

Le président d'Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited au ministre du Commerce

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, April 27, 1957

Dear Mr. Howe,

I have your letter of April 20th in reply to my letter of April 12th with reference to the advice I have received from the United States Atomic Energy Commission that it would be agreeable to the allocation to the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority of 5,000 tons of the 6,000 tons of additional uranium for which Eldorado has contracted as a result of the modification of the special price arrangement last October. This quantity is in addition to the 5,500 tons of uranium which has already been diverted to the UKAEA with the agreement of the USAEC.

I have noted your suggestion that we should proceed with the writing of a contract to cover this additional quantity, regardless of the contingencies mentioned in my letter of April 12th. I fear that this is not possible. At the present time the USAEC has contracted to buy the 6,000 tons of uranium referred to in the previous paragraph. Consequently, if 5,000 tons is to be diverted to the UKAEA, the diversion must be subject to the conditions which the USAEC has laid down as follows:

(a) Eldorado will meet its minimum commitments to the USAEC — i.e., 68,000 tons — in the period July 1st, 1955, to March 31st, 1962.

(b) In the event that any part of the 6,000 tons of additional uranium referred to above is delivered prior to March 31st, 1962, the UKAEA will take five-sixths of the quantity so delivered.

Condition (a) raises no difficulty, since we are now satisfied that we will be able to meet our minimum commitment to the USAEC in the period July 1st, 1955, to March 31st, 1962.

The situation with respect to condition (b) is as follows. As already noted, the 6,000 tons of additional uranium will become available as a result of the modification of the special price formula arrangements. This modification involved an increase in the quantity of certain contracts and an extension of the date for the termination of deliveries from March 31st, 1962, to March 31st, 1963. When the modification was agreed to, the USAEC requested that the following provisions should be made with respect to price:

> On deliveries made prior to March 31st, 1962, the contract price will be paid.
> On deliveries made in the period March 31st, 1962, to March 31st, 1963, the price to be paid will be the contract price OR $8.00 per pound (U.S. funds) plus the amortization allowance used when the original contract price was negotiated.

The request was made because the USAEC had announced that, effective March 31st, 1962, the price to be paid for domestic production would be $8.00 per pound, except in those cases where preproduction and capital expenditures had not been fully amortized — in which event the price would be $8.00 per pound plus an amortization allowance. We regarded this proposal as reasonable, and the contracts have been written accordingly. Incidentally, the UKAEA was fully informed on this point, since it was a party to the discussions which took place in Washington last September when it was decided to modify the special price arrangements. Since in the case of every contract $8.00 plus amortization will be lower than the original contract price, it will be clear that the price to be paid on deliveries made prior to March 31st, 1962, will be higher than the price paid on deliveries in the period March 31st, 1962, to March 31st, 1963. While we have assumed that all of the 6,000 tons will be delivered after March 31st, 1962, there can be no certainty as to this. The USAEC, therefore, takes the position (and it is one with which I cannot quarrel) that should any part of the 6,000 tons be delivered prior to March 31st, 1962, the UKAEA will take its appropriate share of the quantity so delivered.

Plowden has been advised of this condition and has inquired of me as to the extent of the possible dollar commitment which might be involved. He has expressed some concern as to whether the UKAEA would be in a position to increase its dollar commitment in the period up to March 31st, 1962, beyond that for which it is committed in the present contract — i.e. $115,000,000. I have explained to Plowden that it will be extremely difficult for us to establish any firm estimate of what part of the 6,000 tons might be delivered before March 31st, 1962, until all of the mines are in production — that is, sometime early in 1958. I have also made it clear to Plowden that I would have difficulty in supporting any representations which the UKAEA might make to the USAEC that the UKAEA would not be required to take delivery of any part of the 5,000 tons until after March 31st, 1962.

We are now endeavouring to prepare an estimate as to the maximum quantity which might be delivered prior to March 31st, 1962. I am going to London on May 23rd and I hope to be able to give Plowden some idea of what the maximum dollar commitment of the UKAEA might be. I am hopeful that with such information he will be in a position to accept condition (b).

While I fully expect that this difficulty can be resolved, it will be apparent that we are not now in a position to make any announcement with regard to the supply of additional uranium to the UKAEA, nor are we in a position to write a contract with the UKAEA.

Yours sincerely,

W.J. BENNETT

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS RELATING TO SPECIAL PRICE CONTRACTS

In Washington May 15-17 Bill Bennett and I discussed with the United States Atomic Energy Commission the problem of the acceptance by the Commission of deliveries under the special price contracts at an accelerated rate. While the problem is too complicated and lengthy to cover completely in a memorandum, a few salient points emerged which can serve as a basis for discussion amongst ourselves.

This problem has arisen from the expressed intention of the Blind River mines, particularly Algom and Consolidated Denison, to deliver concentrates at a rate greater than was expected and to terminate contracts earlier than was forecast. At Algom and Denison, and to a lesser degree at Pronto, there is evidence to indicate that the ores fed to the mills may carry 10% or more uranium than was estimated and, in addition, the capacity of the plants is probably upwards of 10% in excess of rating.

The United States Atomic Energy Commission undertaking is to accept up to a maximum of 71,000 tons in the period July 1, 1955 to March 31, 1962 and to divert to the United Kingdom 5,500 tons in addition, providing the Commission receive a minimum of 68,000 tons. There is as well provision for Canada to reserve its own requirements and to divert an additional 200 tons per year for sales to other countries. The United Kingdom is strongly against acceptance of any amount in excess of 5,500 tons before March 31, 1962. This undertaking by the United States Atomic Energy Commission is contained in letters and does not bear any direct relationship to the "contracts" between Eldorado and the producers and the covering contracts between Eldorado and the United States Atomic Energy Commission.

The special price contracts after Gunnar and Pronto contain clauses which state: "The producer shall use its best endeavours to deliver concentrates containing approximately X pounds of U_3O_8 each month" after a stated tune-up period. This we call the scheduled rate of production.

It now appears that the United States Atomic Energy Commission may not want to accept deliveries in excess of the aggregate of the scheduled rates of production if the aggregate is in excess of the 68,000 minimum.

Furthermore, the United States Atomic Energy Commission has submitted a budget for its fiscal period July 1, 1957 to June 30, 1958, for the purchase of 11,600 tons and this budget has been passed and accepted. This submission was done without consultation with us. The present drive for economy in Congress makes the Commission concerned about any expenditures in excess of this budget.

There is no doubt in our minds that the chief reason for the Commission's attitude is the Ambrosia Lake discoveries in New Mexico which will raise U.S. production some 5,000 to 8,000 tons in excess of estimates made six months back. Also, it could be that a feeling exists that a higher grade of ore coupled with a greater throughput in the Blind River mines means that prices in the contracts were too high.

We have attempted to estimate deliveries by the producers through March 31, 1962, but this is difficult to do accurately when two small mines are still on the doubtful list of any production at all (Rexspar and Cavendish) and where many other mines are not yet in production and the date they may reach full production quite uncertain. However, assuming the mines not yet in production will achieve same at the earliest possible date, and that no mines will suffer any interruption due to strikes, fire or other mishap, then production through March 31, 1962, would be as follows:

1. At the rate scheduled in the contracts

July 1/55 - June 30/57	–	5,800 tons
July 1/57 - June 30/58	–	11,515 tons
July 1/58 - Mar. 31/62	–	58,849 tons
Total		76,164 tons

Of this total amount, 74,667 is under contract and 1,497 is under option.

The requirements to March 31, 1962, are as follows:

USAEC minimum	–	68,000 tons
UKAEA	–	5,500 tons
Canada and others	–	1,500 tons
		75,000 tons

Thus if all the mines achieve production and all maintain uninterrupted production then we cannot permit them to operate in excess of the scheduled rates in their contracts, if we are not to exceed the U.S.A.E.C. minimum requirement. On the other hand, it would not take very much short-fall, together with the 2,000 tons scheduled for Rexspar and Cavendish to bring the total well below the U.S. minimum requirement of 68,000.

To hold the mines to the scheduled rates in the contract would be extremely unpopular and might afterwards result in hardship if production were interrupted later. Also, to limit the mines during their tax-free run and then afterwards have to ask them for production at a greater rate would place Eldorado in an unenviable position.

I have sought for a formula to permit production in excess of the scheduled rate for a time until we know more definitely how many mines will produce and what rate they are capable of. Such a plan is shown below:

2. No restrictions before June 30, 1957
   Scheduled rates plus 10% July 1, 1957 – June 30, 1958
   Scheduled rates only July 1, 1958 – March 31, 1962

July 1/55 - June 30/57	–	6,006 tons
July 1/57 - June 30/58	–	12,331 tons
July 1/58 - Mar. 31/62	–	58,849 tons
Total		77,186 tons

This would seem a more sensible course than (1) above, but before we could adopt it we would have to get the United States Atomic Energy Commission to accept 12,331 tons in its next fiscal year, or at least to accept 12,331 - 11,600 = 731 tons extra immediately after July 1, 1958, and to accept up to 2,186 tons extra through March 31, 1962, provided the production amounted to 77,186 tons by this date.

3. No restrictions before March 31, 1958
Scheduled rates only April 1, 1958 – March 31, 1962

July 1/55 - June 30/57	–	6,006 tons
July 1/57 - June 30/58	–	12,460 tons
July 1/58 - Mar. 31/62	–	58,849 tons
Total		77,315 tons

The United States Atomic Energy Commission engineers visited us in Ottawa May 28-29 and asked us to prepare estimate (3) above. Jesse Johnson wanted to know how many tons of U_3O_8 the Commission would have to buy under this plan.

(a) No restrictions before December 31, 1957

(b) Restriction to scheduled rate on 3 months' notice at any time thereafter. March 31, 1958, thus becomes the earliest date when a cut-back to scheduled rate can apply.

Bill Bennett and I agree, I think, that the scheduled rate in the contract means something and that there is no invitation in the contract to make deliveries at an excessive rate. Also, if a producer does make deliveries at an excessive rate, then the price worked out in the basis of the producers' estimates was too high. However, we would want to be very sure before limiting production in any way that such limitation would not produce a shortfall. Moreover, before we would put a limit on production to please the United States Atomic Energy Commission, we would want to try to make certain changes which would benefit the producers.

One such change is the exercise of options after March 31, 1962, if even for a limited period, say through March 31, 1963, with a decision at some later date for exercise of options further through December 31, 1966. This Bill Bennett has asked the Commission to do.

The other change would require both the approval of the Canadian Government and the United States Atomic Energy Commission. If the Government approved we would ask the Commission to permit the producers to sell any uranium in excess of the amounts the U.S.A.E.C. and U.K.A.E.A. would accept to foreign parties, subject to the following conditions:

(a) The producer would have to guarantee to complete its contract with Eldorado.

(b) Sales would be subject to Government regulations which require a bilateral agreement, export permit, etc.

(c) If such sales were permitted, it is my personal recommendation that Eldorado permit the seller to negotiate and set its price, subject to the condition that for each pound sold outside the Eldorado contract, the producer sell one of the contract pounds to Eldorado less the cost of the amortization factor. Such sales would be by the producer to the ultimate consumer and Eldorado would have no liability for payment or delivery.

While the United States Atomic Energy Commission would have to consent to this change, it is hard to see how they could refuse since the producer would only be selling uranium which the Commission had refused to buy. The provision in (c) would also lower the price to the Commission, provided any sales were made and, of course, it is highly doubtful if any substantial amount would be sold.

There might be a third way to solve the problem if the Commission would undertake to buy production in excess of the scheduled rate at a price less the amortization factor. However, no one has suggested this to them yet.

Numerous other details and angles on this situation will develop in discussion of this problem with you.

MEETING HELD IN TORONTO JUNE 7TH

Present:
G.C. Bateman, R.J. Henry, W.F. James,
B.S.W. Buffam, E.L. Brown, V.J. Pittson

R.J. Henry's memo of May 30th was discussed and V.J. Pittson reported on a visit to Blind River from which he had just returned.

R.J. Henry stated that recent estimates probably indicated 400-500 tons more production through June 30th, 1958, than had previously been forecast.

After discussing the situation for an hour or so, it was decided that a meeting of the producers should be held in Toronto as soon as possible.

That George Bateman and someone representing the Cabinet (preferably Bob Bryce Jr.) should attend as well as Eldorado officials.

That at this meeting, subject to changes and decisions which the USAEC may make in the meantime, the producers should be told that while we want to take production as fast as possible, we must warn the producers that over-production, if accepted, will be at the producers' risk of a compensating cut-back at a later date, and that we cannot allocate any shortfall at any one mine specifically to another.

Also that the producers should be given the reasons for this policy and full discussion encouraged.

At the same meeting there should be a clear statement by a spokesman for the Government on foreign sales.

There should also be discussion and any notification on options.

After this meeting and after taking into consideration any ideas developed at the meeting each producer should be notified in writing of our policy.

The meeting was in favour of foreign sales by the producer directly to the foreign buyer subject to such restrictions and controls as the Government may impose. The meeting was not in favour of setting the price at which such sales could be negotiated, but it was agreed that a producer should not be selling at prices below the contract price without adjustment to Eldorado. George Bateman suggested that any sales made to foreign buyers should apply on the contract quantity for purposes of amortization, but that deliveries under the contract should not be changed thereby. This would mean that if a producer sold X pounds during the contract to parties other than Eldorado, then the last X pounds delivered under the contract would be paid for at the contract price less amortization. It was thought the USA would be permitted to buy under this arrangement if they so desired and that this permission puts them in the position of having been offered production and having refused it.

EXPORT OF URANIUM: POLICY

Memorandum to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa, n.d.]

BRIEF FOR MEETING OF HEADS OF MISSION IN EUROPE, LONDON, MAY 1956: CANADIAN POLICY CONCERNING THE EXPORT OF URANIUM

1. Canada is already a very substantial producer of uranium, and there is little doubt that production could be significantly expanded if that were desired and the necessary financial arrangements made. Existing production, and that which does not yet exist but can be brought in before September 30, 1957, is obligated until 1962 to the US Atomic Energy Commission. Thus we would not have available for export elsewhere (except perhaps under a special arrangement to the UK) anything more than the merest token quantities until the end of 1957. If the Government should so decide, however, and if it should make the necessary financial and other arrangements, it would probably be possible to produce uranium for export to other countries beginning in 1958. This would probably be soon enough to meet the practical needs of those countries, provided the necessary decisions are taken and the governments concerned are informed in the fairly near future.

2. The decisions involved are of two kinds, one group relating to financial and commercial considerations and the other to political and security consideration. Uranium produced in Canada may be sold only to Eldorado Mining and Refining Ltd. (a Crown Company). So far Eldorado has been willing to conclude the "special price contracts" necessary to attract the required investment capital only in cases where these can be matched against USAEC purchase contracts. In other words, Eldorado until now has acted in this connection as an underwriter between the Canadian producers on the one hand and the USAEC as monopoly purchaser on the other. If uranium is to be marketed elsewhere it will have to be decided (1) whether Eldorado will continue to serve as an underwriter, matching purchase contracts from abroad against domestic production contracts, (2) whether Eldorado will branch out into buying uranium for ultimate sale abroad but concluding its purchasing contracts without awaiting specific commitments from potential buyers, or (3) whether the Atomic Energy Control Act shall be amended to permit Canadian producers to sell to purchasers other than Eldorado. There would be subsidiary decisions required concerning pricing policy and other related matters, but the fundamental point would be to determine the role to be played by the Canadian government (and financial liability to be assumed by it) in marketing uranium.

3. On the political and security side, it will be necessary to decide what purchasers will be acceptable and on what terms they would be permitted to purchase. There is not yet a clear picture of what control system will be established under the proposed International Atomic Energy Agency, nor of the relationship of that control system to bilateral agreements which may be concluded outside the Agency. Equally the Government has not yet decided what safeguards, if any, it would require of purchasing governments in connection with uranium exported from Canada, and what role Eldorado might play in this connection.

4. The points touched on above indicate the range of important decisions yet to be taken before the Government can declare an explicit policy on the marketing of uranium abroad. Preparatory work on these matters is proceeding and it is hoped that recommendations on at least some of these matters will be ready for submission to Ministers shortly. In the meantime, it is clear that our supplies of uranium are ample to provide that material in quantities far beyond any foreseeable domestic requirement. Subject to the solution of the problems indicated above, therefore, it seems proper to look forward to supplying uranium to other countries in substantial quantities, both as a wholesome commercial development and in order to make available to friendly countries the raw material on which to base their atomic energy programmes.

5. In recent months enquiries have been made by various European governments. Pending decisions on the questions indicated above, we have been at some pains to encourage friendly European governments to look to Canada for their uranium supplies. The line that has been taken is indicated in the attached extract from a statement made by Mr. Wilgress at the OEEC Ministerial Meeting which took place earlier this spring.[6] There are also attached for convenience of reference certain extracts from Hansard containing relevant statements by Mr. Howe and yourself.[7] It will be recognized that the various projects for co-operation among European countries in atomic energy matters will have a bearing on Canada's uranium export policy; some comments on Canada's attitude towards Euratom and the OEEC proposals for atomic co-operation are provided in the brief on European integration.†

CONTROLS ON BILATERAL ATOMIC AGREEMENTS

It will be recalled that it was decided at a meeting in Mr. Bennett's office on June 20 to have a paper prepared summarizing the principal points which emerged in the discussion. It was intended that this paper, after possible informal discussion with Ministers most directly concerned, would serve as guidance to Mr. Bennett in his projected discussion with European officials concerning the possible supply of uranium from Canada.

I attach for your consideration a draft which we have prepared designed to serve the purpose indicated. The final two paragraphs record relevant developments which have taken place since the meeting.

It is my understanding that the original purpose of this paper is now less important, since Mr. Bennett has had to reduce the amount of time which he expects to spend on the continent of Europe and since he has reconsidered the desirability of discussing the supply of uranium with Swedish and French authorities at present. I understand he would now prefer to avoid such discussions until the conference scheduled to open in New York on September 20 to consider the draft statute for the proposed International Atomic Energy Agency.[8]

I believe, however, that Mr. Bennett still expects to discuss such questions with Mr. Wilgress in Paris, perhaps during the OEEC Ministerial Meeting taking place July 16-18. The attached paper may be useful for that purpose. It occurs to me, moreover, that it might provide a starting point for the preparation of a Canadian position for the proposed multilateral talks referred to in the final paragraph of the attached draft.

I should therefore be grateful for your comments on this draft, if possible in order that they may be incorporated in a revised text prior to Mr. Bennett's departure for Europe now planned for July 15.

Projet d'une note

Draft Memorandum

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], July 5, 1956

CONTROLS ON BILATERAL ATOMIC AGREEMENTS

On June 20 Mr. Bryce, Mr. Bennett and Mr. Léger discussed inter alia the question of controls on bilateral agreements to cover the sale of Canadian uranium. There were two particular reasons for discussing the matter at that time. One was the request from the United States (Washington's Letter No. 777 of June 2†) for our comments on the control articles which U.S. authorities proposed to include in their future bilateral agreements, a request implying that they hoped Canada would impose similar conditions on the sale of natural uranium. A second reason related to Mr. Bennett's forthcoming trip to Europe, during which it was expected that he might have discussions with officials of various countries concerning the possible supply of uranium from Canada. Of particular importance are the requests from Sweden for ten tons annually and from France for 400 tons annually.

2. An interim reply† had already been sent to the United States' enquiry to the effect that we were not in a position to determine our attitude on bilateral controls until the position of other countries was clearer. There was no immediate prospect of our concluding any bilateral agreement to supply uranium and we would discuss with U.S. authorities again before doing so.

3. It was the view of the meeting that no further response should be made at present.

4. On the question of what controls we should actually require, it was suggested that a distinction might be made between significant quantities of uranium and what could be described as research quantities. (The latter term would perhaps cover the Swedish request, but scarcely the French one.) It was pointed out, however, that Canada will be the largest single supplier and indeed will tend almost to dominate the uranium market; if she does not provide a clear lead on the control question there is little likelihood of general acceptance of the need for controls on transactions in natural uranium. Hence our support of the principle that controls are desirable should be made unambiguously clear. We could, of course, in such cases as that of the Swedish request, indicate informally that although we considered the principle important we would expect that its application to individual cases could be arranged by agreement so as to involve a minimum of burdensome procedures.

5. This general approach being accepted, it was the concensus that Mr. Bennett might express our position to the Swedes should the occasion arise. He could explain our view that "bilateral transactions in natural uranium should as a matter of principle be subject to controls. It would be our hope that such controls might be carried out through the control establishment to be set up by the proposed International Atomic Energy Agency. If it should be necessary, however, for us to specify terms prior to the establishment of the Agency we could do so; they would be similar (allowing for the fact that they would operate bilaterally rather than multilaterally) to those which we wish to see incorporated in the Agency's control arrangements."

6. A similar indication of our views on control could be given to the French authorities. The context would be somewhat different, however, since we are in a position to release the amount of uranium requested by Sweden but not at present that requested by France.

Hence discussion of controls with the French would be conditioned by supply considerations.

7. Discussion then turned to the control arrangements which we might accept for release of uranium to a group of countries through some such regional organization as Euratom or OEEC. It was pointed out that these organizations might well establish among themselves a technically adequate control system in which Canada would not participate. While there would be strong arguments in favour of releasing uranium to be controlled in that way, there might be embarrassment in according to such arrangements a degree of confidence which we were not prepared to accord to the participating governments individually.

8. Finally, it was accepted that the considerations mentioned above in connection with bilateral agreements were applicable only to allegedly peaceful uses of uranium. We might in individual cases be prepared after consideration to provide uranium to countries planning to use it for military programmes; indeed we already do for the United States, and while the point is not entirely clear it would not be surprising if some of the uranium which we recently undertook to supply to the United Kingdom were to be used for military purposes. Such cases, however, would be dealt with separately and in accordance with different criteria from those governing supply for peaceful uses.

9. Since that meeting of June 20 there have been two developments having a bearing on these matters. The United States has concluded bilateral agreements with several countries, and while the precise terms are not known it appears that the countries concerned (Australia, Brazil, France, The Netherlands, New Zealand, Switzerland) have agreed to conditions more or less the same as those on which Canadian comments had been requested. Countries therefore appear willing to accept such conditions for agreements involving the transfer of enriched uranium, but it is not clear that this would extend to natural uranium. Indeed France has made it clear that it would not wish to accept such controls for natural uranium transactions.

10. The second new development is a further approach by the United States. The U.S. had already asked the U.S.S.R. if it would be willing to discuss the possible standardization of safeguards under which the two countries would be willing to provide assistance through the Agency, and the possibility of an agreement to subject bilateral agreements to Agency controls. The U.S. has subsequently asked Canada, France and the U.K. if they would be willing to join in such a discussion. The reply† has already been given that Canada would be willing to join the other governments mentioned in an examination of these questions; the position of the other three governments (France, U.K., U.S.S.R.) is not yet known.

SALE OF URANIUM

I am seriously concerned over the situation in which we seem to be placed whereby it is impossible for us to give any hope to those European countries such as France and Sweden which have shown interest in purchasing uranium from us. I know that this subject is explosive and that we should be cautious in considering such requests before good progress is made in setting up some form of control through the international agency. We must bear in mind, however, that this country will continue to be a major exporter of uranium and that we must find markets for our future production. Otherwise we will have to bear some responsibility for whatever disruption might be caused by the lack of markets.

2. If we are clear in our own minds that our normal market apart from the United States and the United Kingdom is in Western Europe, then I think we should be more forthcoming in meeting approaches received from countries of that region. We need not necessarily take sides in the Euratom versus OEEC controversy since, I presume, we would be willing to sell to both.

3. In a simplified form the control aspect of this problem appears to me as follows: either a satisfactory control system will be set and there is no problem, or, none will be set and there will be no sale. If it were possible to spell this out in agreeing to the release of uranium as of 1957 or 1958, then I think we should give sympathetic and urgent consideration to the requests already received, and possibly also prompt requests from other countries of Western Europe.

4. While unfamiliar with developments in other uranium producing countries, I am afraid that our indifference might lead such countries as Belgium, and possibly also South Africa, to make an attempt to capture some of the markets which normally could be supplied from Canada.

5. I should like to discuss this with Messrs. Barton and Kirkwood as well as the political officers of the Divisions concerned.[9]

Ottawa, July 19, 1956

Dear Mr. Léger,

CONTROLS ON BILATERAL ATOMIC AGREEMENTS

I have read with interest the draft memorandum you have prepared setting out the conclusions which were reached at our meeting some weeks ago with respect to the control provisions of bilateral agreements covering the sale of natural uranium.

I would suggest the following revisions in the memorandum -

(a) The following to be substituted for paragraph 4:

[9] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
This meeting is arranged for 3 o'clock in the Under Sec[re]t[ar]y's Office Tues[day] July 24. Represented will be Economic, European, U.N. and D.L. Divisions W.O. M[atthews]

"On the question of what controls we should actually require, it was suggested that a distinction might be made between significant quantities of uranium and what could be described as research quantities. (The latter term would cover the Swedish request, but scarcely the French one). It was pointed out, however, that Canada as a major supplier of uranium should show leadership and should act with responsibility. Hence we should make unambiguously clear our support of the principle that controls are desirable. We could of course ..."

(b) The following to be substituted for paragraph 6:

"As far as the French request is concerned there is an added complication in that the quantity of material requested is not available from current or planned production. Arrangements would have to be made for its supply either by opening a new mine or by increasing the production capacities of existing mines. Such an increase in the total production capacity in Canada would mean that should there be a cut-back in demands from the U.S. military programme after March 31, 1962, we would have an even greater expected surplus capacity in Canada at that time. On the other hand, unless initial orders from industrial countries like France are accepted now, Canada cannot expect to build up a wide export market which financially is most desirable. This decision on production capacity has first to be made. If it is decided to increase production and be in a position to meet the French request, then the French authorities could be so informed. At the same time they could be informed of our position on controls as set out in paragraph 5 above."

With reference to revision (b), it should be noted that at the present time all Canadian uranium production is committed to the United States and the United Kingdom — that is, the production which will become available under existing contracts, or contracts which are now pending. There is a provision in all contracts that Canada may reserve production for her own use. It has also been agreed that Canada may divert from the uranium to be produced under existing arrangements, an amount not in excess of 200 tons per annum for supply to other countries for research purposes. In other words, we would only be in a position to meet the French requirement of a thousand tons by bringing in additional production, or by agreement with the United States that an additional quantity could be diverted from production now committed to the United States. Either course presents problems although of a different kind.

Yours sincerely,
W.J. BENNETT

Memorandum from Clerk of Privy Council to Prime Minister

SECRET [Ottawa], January 18, 1957

POLICY IN REGARD TO EXPORT OF URANIUM FROM CANADA

You will recall the various problems we have had on this matter both in connection with the American and British procurement programmes and with the International Agency that is now in the course of being organized.

It is now necessary to formulate some policy in regard to the sale of uranium abroad, at least in small quantities. In order to meet this, a memorandum has been drawn up by Mr. Bennett and Mr. Watson of Atomic Energy, by External Affairs, Finance and this office for consideration by yourself, Mr. Howe, Mr. Pearson and Mr. Harris. It contains at its end some suggestions for policy and a couple of appendices in detail about control both in general and as applied to the Indian reactor as an example. It is not intended that these appendices be approved in detail and more work on them will be necessary but they are attached to illustrate something of the nature of the problem.

I would recommend that you concur in the proposals that are recommended in paragraph 8 of the memorandum.[10] I should, of course, be glad to discuss them with you. Mr. Howe has suggested that one of them be re-worded to clarify it. I have had his rewording pinned at the proper place in the original.

Mr. Léger, in submitting the paper to Mr. Pearson, has drawn to his attention the fact that no reference is made in the recommendations to the supply situation after the next few years. He tells me "I shall say that while interested governments will no doubt question us on this point at an early opportunity, the position after 1962 is not clear enough for us to give other governments any firm assurance at present that we will be able to meet their requirements. Accordingly Mr. Bennett in particular regards it as the wise course (and I do not dissent) to make no reference to this particular question in the proposed declaration of the general terms on which we are now prepared to supply uranium."

In fact the contractual and other commercial situation is quite complicated and will require further study in the next few months to determine whether we should and can take action to enable us to contract to sell substantial quantities to countries other than the United States and the United Kingdom.[11]

SECRET [Ottawa], January 9, 1957

EXPORT OF URANIUM FROM CANADA

1. During the last year or so a number of enquiries have been received from other Governments, some fairly firm and others more tentative, on the possibility of obtaining uranium from Canada. Except in one case the quantities in which these Governments were interested have been relatively small. The exception arises in the case of France, which expressed the wish to conclude arrangements for the purchase from Canada of approximately 1000 tons of uranium over the three year period extending approximately from 1958 to 1960.

2. Our substantial output of uranium (some 15,000 tons (valued at approximately $300,000,000) annually by 1958) is at present entirely committed, except for the small quantities we may require for our own programme, in contracts to the United States and the United Kingdom until 1962. The United States authorities, however, have declared themselves prepared to permit the diversion from the amounts contracted to them of up to 200 tons per year provided that scheduled annually deliveries are maintained; this will permit us to meet modest initial requirements of countries which will need larger amounts in following years for their peaceful atomic programmes. It was on the basis of this understanding that Mr. Howe announced on May 25 of last year that the Government was prepared now to consider requests for "research quantities" of uranium,[12] but would not be in a position to consider requests from other governments for larger quantities until a later date.

3. Aside from the supply problem however, there has been hesitation about giving a definite response to the various enquiries which have been made because of uncertainty concerning the problem of controls. It has been the policy of the Government that it would be undesirable for natural uranium to be exported for peaceful uses from Canada or other producing countries without controls adequate to prevent its diversion to military use. We know and accept the fact that our shipments to the United States and the United Kingdom may be used in the atomic weapons programmes conducted by those two countries. The exact control position which we should adopt with regard to uranium exports from Canada could not be determined until a more general pattern of international controls relating to the peaceful uses of atomic energy had begun to emerge. It was obvious that the main forum for the development of an international control pattern would be the negotiations directed towards the establishment of the International Atomic Energy Agency. Governments which have enquired about the supply of uranium have therefore been informed that we would not be able to define the terms on which we could make uranium available until the control principles to be applied by the Agency should be determined. As the Statute for the Agency has recently been prepared and signed, and the control question debated in some detail in the course of the Conference which produced that Statute, we are now able to declare our position on the question of control in relation to the provision of uranium from Canada to other countries.

4. In accordance with its directive from the Government,[13] the Canadian Delegation at that Conference took the position that the Agency should establish an effective system of international controls (to be operated under the authority of the Board of Governors of the Agency), that these controls should apply as appropriate to transactions conducted through the Agency including the supply of source materials such as natural uranium, and that the Agency's control machinery should be applicable at the request of the parties concerned to bilateral or multilateral transactions concluded outside the Agency. In order to protect us against a situation in which other suppliers might be willing to provide natural uranium not subject to control we made no explicit commitment that the provision of uranium from Canada would be undertaken only subject to controls; but we made clear our view that it would be in the best interests of all countries that extension of Agency controls to bilateral agreements should become the general rule, and our hope that producing and purchasing countries alike would recognize that fact and act accordingly. The Statute's provisions are in accord with this Canadian position, but it remains to be determined whether other governments will in fact be willing to avail themselves of these facilities by requesting the extension of Agency controls to their bilateral agreements.

5. It is considered desirable that the general terms should now be determined on which the Government would be prepared to enter into bilateral agreements to cover the supply of uranium for peaceful uses to countries other than the United Kingdom and the United States. Such agreements, incidentally, might in appropriate cases be broadened to cover other forms of cooperation than the supply of uranium. It is proposed that for the present the supply of uranium be contemplated only within the context of the understanding with the U.S.A.E.C. that up to 200 tons may be diverted annually from their contracts, and that no consideration be given at this time to further expansion of Canadian production facilities beyond what is now planned to meet the existing U.K. and U.S. contracts.

6. The control features of the general terms on which we might enter negotiations for bilateral agreements on the supply of uranium constitute broad principles which can now be determined and which we know to be acceptable to the governments most closely associated with us in these matters. It is therefore considered desirable that these features should be made known as soon as possible, first on a confidential basis to certain friendly governments and shortly thereafter in a public statement. Countries which might be given prior notice include first the United States and the United Kingdom, secondly certain friendly producing countries which may thereby be encouraged to impose similar conditions on the sale of uranium (Australia, Belgium, Portugal and South Africa) and thirdly the countries which have made specific enquiries about the purchase of Canadian uranium (Denmark, France, Germany, India, Japan, Pakistan, Sweden and Switzerland).

7. Before these control features could be written into the text of bilateral agreements, however, it will be necessary to work out the procedures and machinery required for their application. Tripartite (U.S.-U.K.-Canadian) talks on this subject are proposed for the second half of January, and the preparation for and results of those talks should permit the determination by early February of the detailed provisions on control which we will require for our bilateral agreements. In this connection, we do not know when the International Agency may be in a position to apply controls and we must envisage that controls applied directly by Canada in cooperation with the purchasing country will be necessary as an interim measure for cases where the purchasing countries wish to obtain deliveries before the Agency control system is in effect. The preliminary examination of the application of controls to the supply of natural uranium has been carried out with particular reference to the provision of the fuel elements for the C.I.R. reactor in India, and the tentative conclusions of that study are annexed.

8. It is accordingly recommended:

(a) That the Governments of Australia, Belgium, Portugal, South Africa, the United Kingdom and the United States, with which we are closely associated in matters relating to the supply of uranium, and the Governments of Denmark, France, Germany, India, Japan, Pakistan, Sweden and Switzerland, which have expressed an interest in the purchase of uranium, be informed in confidence of the general terms, set out below, on which the Canadian Government would propose to negotiate bilateral agreements to cover the supply of uranium;

(b) That after a suitable short interval a public announcement of these terms be made;

(c) That the terms be as follows:

(i) The Government of Canada is now prepared to enter into negotiations directed towards the conclusion of bilateral agreements with friendly governments to provide for the supply of uranium from Canada for peaceful uses in those countries;

(ii) For reasons of supply the amounts of uranium which can at present be made available in accordance with such agreements are limited to research quantities; nevertheless it is expected that these quantities will be sufficient to meet the current requirements of most governments wishing to obtain uranium from Canada;

(iii) Convinced that international transactions in fissionable materials for peaceful uses should be subject to effective safeguards against diversion to other uses, in order that such materials may be freely supplied and become available to all countries with assurance for all against their abuse, the Canadian Government will require that the Agreements contemplated in (i) above provide for adequate safeguards against diversion of the uranium supplied to other than peaceful uses, and would hope that governments wishing to conclude such agreements will join with it in requesting the International Atomic Energy Agency to apply appropriate safeguards;

(iv) Except for the provision mentioned in (iii) above, the Canadian Government under such agreements will expect to supply uranium to other governments on a normal commercial basis.

(d) That the terms set out in (c) above be those which be now made known to other governments, and thereafter made public; but that there be worked out as soon as possible detailed provisions for their application such as to permit the exercise of control either by the Agency, or (with the Agency being appropriately informed) by Canada in cooperation with purchasing governments;

(e) That, following the working out of the necessary detailed provisions, negotiations directed towards the conclusion of bilateral agreements of the type indicated be undertaken with governments willing to negotiate to this end on the terms outlined above.

Annex A

It is considered that three separate elements are involved in the application of controls adequate to ensure full accountability for natural uranium which may be supplied to other governments. Of these the first is the production by the recipient government of operating and other records (which it will no doubt have to maintain for domestic purposes in any case), the second is the auditing of these records to determine the disposition at any given time of uranium supplied, and the third is inspection as necessary to verify the records supplied and the results of the audit.

Bearing in mind the quantity of special fissionable material which can be produced from natural uranium and the amount of special fissionable material required to make an atomic warhead it is considered that full control is needed for the supply of natural uranium in quantities greater than ten tons. From the same considerations it is not thought that any control is necessary in practice on the supply of material with under one ton of uranium content. In the region of one to ten tons, the control could be less than complete to an extent dependent upon the form of the material supplied and other relevant factors.

It is not technically possible to make analyses of special fissionable material with accuracies of less than a few percent and therefore it is suggested that the records of special fissionable material should be given to the nearest 100 grams. For natural uranium it is suggested that the reports should likewise be given only in round numbers — to the nearest 1000 kilograms.

It is suggested that reports be called for annually and that the reports should state (a) the quantities of materials held at the beginning of the year,

(b) the quantities of materials received during the year,

(c) the quantities of special fissionable materials produced during the year from the materials supplied,

(d) the reduction during the year of the stocks supplied,

(e) the quantities of materials held at the end of the year which have been supplied or which have been produced from materials supplied.

If the operation of the project results in the loss or destruction of source or special fissionable material supplied or produced from fuel supplied, an explanation should accompany the report. It will not normally be necessary to list any loss or destruction if the quantities involved are less than the minimum accounting figures given above.

In the future it may be that the reporting of other source material besides natural uranium (e.g. thorium) or other special fissionable materials besides plutonium (e.g. uranium-235, uranium-233) will be required. Should these latter special fissionable materials be supplied, a problem arises in that there would undoubtedly be varying degrees of enrichment. To meet this point, it is suggested that the following six categories of materials be set up for reporting purposes:

(i) Plutonium

(ii) Uranium-235 contained in enriched uranium in which the uranium-235 content is greater than five percent of the total weight of uranium content.

(iii) Uranium-233 contained in enriched uranium in which the uranium-233 is greater than five percent of total weight of uranium content.

(iv) Uranium containing uranium-235 in which the uranium-235 is less than five percent of the total weight of uranium content.

(v) Uranium containing uranium-233 in which the uranium-233 is less than five percent of the total weight of uranium content.

(vi) Thorium—A suggested form for the report is shown in Appendix I.†

A draft article on proposed safeguards for incorporation in the agreement which is required to cover the supply of fuel elements for the C.I.R. (India) reactor is shown as Appendix II.

Appendice II à l'annexe A

Appendix II to Annex A

PRELIMINARY DRAFT FOR FURTHER CONSIDERATION

Article on Safeguards for the C.I.R. Reactor Fuel Element Agreement

1. In keeping with the principles of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the following safeguards will apply to any source or special fissionable material made available to the Government of India or to any person under its jurisdiction by the Government of Canada or any person under its jurisdiction, and any source or special fissionable material utilized in, recovered from or produced as a result of the operation of the nuclear reactor of the NRX type provided to the Government of India by the Government of Canada under the Colombo Plan hereinafter referred to as the C.I.R. Reactor.

2. The Government of India hereby guarantees,

(a) that source and special fissionable materials shall be safeguarded against (1) hazards of the weather, (2) unauthorized removal or diversion, (3) damage or destruction, including sabotage and (4) forcible seizure.

(b) that the C.I.R. Reactor will be operated and that the source and special fissionable materials present in India will be handled with due regard to the health and safety hazards involved and in accordance with the standards recommended by the International Commission of Radiological Protection.

(c) that the operating records of the C.I.R. Reactor will be maintained and periodic reports issued as set out in the Detailed Procedure accompanying this agreement for the purpose of assisting in ensuring accountability for source and special fissionable materials.

(d) that special fissionable materials recovered or produced in the C.I.R. Reactor will be used for peaceful purposes for research or in reactors, existing or under construction, and that any excess of special fissionable materials recovered or produced over what is needed for the above stated purposes be disposed of pursuant to an arrangement mutually acceptable to both parties or be deposited at a location specified by the Government of Canada in order to prevent stockpiling, but on the understanding that thereafter at the request of the Government of India, the special fissionable materials so deposited shall be returned promptly to the Government of India for use under the same provisions as stated above.

(e) the right of the Government of Canada to send into India inspectors designated after consultation with the Government of India who shall have access at all times to all places and data and to any person who by reason of his occupation deals with source and special fissionable materials, as necessary to account for source and special fissionable materials supplied and fissionable products and to determine whether there is compliance of the undertakings by the Government of India as set out in sub-paragraphs (a), (b), (c), and (d) above. The inspectors shall be accompanied by representatives of the Government of India if the Government of India so requests, provided that the inspectors shall not thereby be delayed or otherwise impeded in the exercise of their functions. It is expected that the audit and inspection of natural uranium fuel before entering the reactor will be nominal.

3. In the event of non-compliance and failure of the Government of India to take requested corrective steps within a reasonable time, the Government of Canada shall suspend or terminate the supply of source or special fissionable material and shall withdraw materials already supplied.

4. When the International Atomic Energy Agency is in a position to administer controls and safeguards required by the Agency in connection with similar assistance rendered to a cooperating nation under the aegis of the Agency, the Contracting Parties shall consult with each other to determine in what respects and to what extent they desire to arrange for the Agency to administer like controls and safeguards in this Agreement.[14]

President, Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

Ottawa, January 31, 1957

Dear Jules [Léger],

At our meeting last Thursday we touched briefly on the question of the procedure to be followed in connection with the negotiation of Bilateral Agreements covering the sale of uranium.

I think we must anticipate that there will be two stages in the procedure — first, the negotiation of a formal Agreement between the Government of Canada and the government of the country to which the uranium will be sold, and, second, the negotiation of a sales contract between Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited and the agency or corporation which has been designated as the buyer by the receiving country. In some cases the sales contract may be with a government agency and in others it may be with a private corporation.

It is my view that the Bilateral Agreement should be quite specific as to the control provisions which will apply and should not contain any specific information as to the quantity of uranium to be supplied, price, specifications, deliveries, etc. These latter points should be covered in the sales contract. One of the several advantages in not specifying quantity in the Bilateral Agreement is that this will permit us to increase the quantities, should this be possible or desirable, without seeking an amendment to the Bilateral.

I think we are agreed that the actual negotiation of both the Bilateral and the sales contract should take place in Ottawa. I suggest that your Department should accept the prime responsibility for the negotiation of the Bilateral, with the understanding that our technical and legal people will be available for consultation. I suggest that Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited should have the prime responsibility for the negotiation of the sales contract. We will, of course, keep you fully informed as to the details of any contracts that may be negotiated.

Yours sincerely,
W.J. BENNETT

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 1, 1957

BILATERAL AGREEMENTS TO COVER THE EXPORT OF URANIUM FROM CANADA

I attach for your signature, if you approve, a telegram to London and Washington giving the text of an aide mémoire to inform the U.K. and U.S. governments of the general terms on which the government is prepared to negotiate bilateral agreements covering the supply of uranium. The terms are those recently approved by Ministers, with certain drafting improvements suggested by Mr. Bryce and two minor additions proposed by Mr. Bennett and implicit in the memorandum which went to the Ministers. One of the additions is to describe the proposed agreements as for "cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy, covering in particular the supply of uranium"; this is designed to permit the inclusion as appropriate of clauses relating to exchange of information or personnel, etc. The other change is to describe the "adequate safeguards" envisaged as "similar to those contemplated in Article XII of the Statute of the Agency". This has of course been intended throughout, but Mr. Bennett has pointed out that unless it is made explicit some governments might hope to obtain from Canada less stringent control provisions than the Agency would require. These additions are satisfactory to Mr. Bryce and Mr. Taylor.

As it is desirable to proceed as rapidly as possible, the telegram envisages the delivery of the aide mémoire to U.K. and U.S. representatives (in Ottawa and also in London and Washington) on Monday (February 4). This would be followed by delivery of its substance to representatives in Ottawa of the twelve other governments involved on February 6.

I would suggest that you or Mr. Macdonnell might call in Mr. Pritchard and Mr. Thompson of the U.K. and U.S. missions on the Monday; we would provide you with suitable texts of the aide mémoire, and Mr. Kirkwood could attend if you should so wish. As for the other twelve, the interviews with France, Germany, and India (each of which might be at Head of Mission level) will be of special significance; you might wish to handle them yourself. It might be, to share the burden, that the others could be delivered more or less as follows: Mr. Macdonnell — Japan, Sweden, Switzerland; Mr. Matthews — Australia, Belgium, South Africa; myself — Denmark, Pakistan, Portugal.

Mr. Bennett has spoken to Mr. Howe, who will be prepared to make the proposed statement in the House during the week of February 11.

EXPORT OF URANIUM FROM CANADA

We set out below the text of an aide mémoire which we shall transmit to the Ottawa representatives of the UK and US governments on Monday, February 4. As the text explains, the information contained will be transmitted on February 6 to Ottawa representatives of Australia, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, India, Japan, Pakistan, Portugal, South Africa, Sweden and Switzerland. This group of 12 contains 4 friendly uranium producing countries and 8 countries which have expressed an interest in obtaining uranium from Canada.

You should transmit the substance of the aide mémoire to the UK and US governments on Monday, February 24. We do not propose, however, that the text should be delivered in other capitals on February 6; the delivery to these other governments will take place in Ottawa only. We are therefore sending this telegram (in some cases by bag) to our missions in those other capitals solely for information.

It is expected that Mr. Howe will make an announcement in the House during the week of February 11 containing the substance of the information contained in the aide mémoire.

Text of the aide mémoire is as follows:

"The Department of External Affairs wishes to inform _____ that the Canadian government has decided upon the general terms upon which it is prepared to negotiate with other friendly governments for bilateral agreements for cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy, covering in particular the supply of natural uranium by Canada. The governments of the United Kingdom and of the United States are being informed of these terms to-day both in Ottawa and in the two capitals concerned; it is the intention that the terms shall be made known in confidence on February 6 to the governments of certain other friendly countries, including both uranium producers and prospective purchasers, and that a statement outlining the terms shall be made in the House of Commons probably during the following week. Thereafter negotiations may be entered into with any friendly government wishing to conclude a bilateral agreement on these terms.

The general terms referred to are as follows:

(i) The Government of Canada is now prepared to enter into negotiations with friendly governments directed towards the conclusion of bilateral agreements for cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy, covering in particular the supply of natural uranium for such uses in those countries.

(ii) For reasons of supply the amounts of uranium which can at present be made available in accordance with such agreements are limited to research quantities; nevertheless it is believed that these quantities will be sufficient to meet the current requirements of most governments known to be interested in obtaining uranium from Canada.

(iii) The Canadian Government believes that international transactions in fissionable materials for peaceful uses should be subject to effective safeguards against diversion to other uses, in order that such materials may be freely supplied by producing countries and available to importing countries for peaceful uses with assurance for all against abuse. This concept is embodied in the statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency. It is the intention of the Canadian Government, therefore in accordance with its support of the principles of that statute, that the agreements envisaged in (i) above provide for adequate safeguards, similar to those contemplated in Article XII of the Statute, against diversion of the uranium supplied and of fissionable products thereof to other than peaceful uses. The Canadian government hopes that governments wishing to conclude such agreements will join with it in requesting the Agency to apply appropriate safeguards.

(iv) Except for the provision mentioned in (iii) above, the Canadian Government under such agreements will expect to supply uranium to other governments on a normal commercial basis.

The Department of External Affairs will be grateful if this information is treated as confidential until a public statement is made by the Canadian government.[15]

Le président d'Eldorado Mining and Refining Limited au ministre du Commerce

Dear Mr. Howe,

As you are aware, the French Government approached us about a year ago as to the possibility of purchasing 1,000 tons of uranium, deliveries to be made over a three-year period commencing in 1958. We found it necessary to advise the French that this quantity could not be made available in view of existing contractual commitments. Apart from the problem of availability, we had not determined what our export policy should be for countries other than the United States and the United Kingdom. For obvious reasons, no great stress was put on this second point in our discussions with the French.

When it was decided that we would be in a position to make available 200 tons per year under Bilateral Agreements, I inquired of the French Atomic Energy Commission as to whether it was still interested in purchasing uranium from Canada. I indicated that we might be in a position to make available up to 50 tons per year. Concurrently with my inquiry the Department of External Affairs advised the French Government of the general terms under which the Government of Canada would enter into Bilaterals. Doctor Goldschmidt, one of the senior officers of the French Atomic Energy Commission, advised me that the Commission would be interested in purchasing 50 tons per year over a five-year period under a Bilateral Agreement. Doctor Goldschmidt came to Ottawa last week for the purpose of discussing with Eldorado contract terms and for the purpose of discussing with the Department of External Affairs a Bilateral Agreement. The discussions on the sales contract were reasonably satisfactory, although Goldschmidt advanced the proposition that controlled uranium should be sold at lower than the going price. However, it was evident from the discussions that the French were unhappy about control provisions in a Bilateral Agreement. At a meeting held later in the week with the Department of External Affairs, which was attended by the French Ambassador and Goldschmidt, we were advised that instructions had been received from Paris that the French Government could not accept the control provisions proposed in our Bilateral Agreement. While no specific reason was given for this attitude, it is our impression that France is either now engaged in a military programme or is making plans to get into a military programme. In such circumstances it would be difficult, if not impossible, to enforce the control provisions contemplated in our Bilaterals — even if they were acceptable to the French Government.

I am advising you of these developments in view of Premier Mollet's impending visit to Ottawa. Bob Bryce has given a similar briefing to the Prime Minister. We have no reason to believe that the question will be raised during Premier Mollet's visit, but there is the possibility that a proposal might be made that Canada should sell uranium to France without controls — that is, on the same basis that we are selling uranium to the United States and to the United Kingdom. In considering such a policy account would have to be taken of our relations with other friendly governments which have indicated interest in purchasing uranium under Bilateral Agreements. If an exception were made in the case of France, it might be difficult to maintain our control policy in other Bilaterals. Certainly before any final decision is made it would be advisable that we should consult both the United States and the United Kingdom, since we have maintained thus far a common position on the question of controls.

Yours sincerely,
W.J. BENNETT

SECRET Ottawa, March 4, 1957

Dear Mr. Bryce:

THE EXPORT OF URANIUM BY CANADA

You will have seen the paper entitled "Euratom and the Export of Uranium by Canada" which was prepared for the Prime Minister in connection with Mr. Mollet's visit[16] and of which a copy is attached for convenience of reference.

It is argued in that paper that important political decisions will be required in connection with the possible export of uranium to France and also to Euratom. These decisions would relate to questions which were not considered by Ministers at the time that they agreed upon the uranium export policy recently announced by Mr. Howe. Under the announcement policy it would be possible to negotiate bilateral agreements to cover the supply of uranium for peaceful uses with a number of countries, including possible prospective members of Euratom other than France; nevertheless it would appear desirable that these political questions should be faced and the Government's position on them determined as far as possible before we become deeply committed in negotiations with any prospective member of Euratom and perhaps even with any Western European country. As we are being pressed by France, Germany and Switzerland in particular, it would appear to me desirable that these important political questions should be taken up in the near future.

In the attached paper there is explained the limited extent upon our present knowledge and understanding of United States and United Kingdom views on the problems in question. The Government would scarcely wish to take a position on these matters without a pretty full knowledge of the views of those other two governments; indeed I have already informed the French Ambassador that the particular French request raises questions upon which the Government would almost certainly wish to consult the United States and the United Kingdom.

In these circumstances it would seem to me desirable that we should have some preliminary discussion of these matters at an early date, at which time we might agree upon the manner in which U.S. and U.K. views should be sought. It would appear to us that the approval of Ministers should be obtained prior to any approach to these two governments, or alternatively we might conclude that enquiries could be made first and the matter put before Ministers only when some preliminary indication of U.S. and U.K. views has been obtained. Apart from the question of consultation with these other two governments, we might also wish to consider whether a paper similar to the one attached should be put before Ministers now for their information.

If you agree that an early meeting would be desirable, perhaps you would wish to convene a meeting to be attended by Mr. Bennett, Mr. Taylor and General Foulkes as well as ourselves. I would suggest adding General Foulkes to the group which recently has been concerned with these matters because in the present situation the probable future role of atomic weapons within the NATO lines and elsewhere would be of importance.

Yours sincerely,

EURATOM AND THE EXPORT OF URANIUM BY CANADA

M. Mollet's staff have told our Embassy in Paris that he will be interested to discuss, in connection with Euratom, "the problem of obtaining supplies of uranium and in particular his view that control of fissionable materials at the disposal of the Agency should ultimately be taken over by Euratom". We have been told that on this as on other questions it is not M. Mollet's intention to seek definite agreements on any of the matters that might be discussed, but rather to exchange views fully and confidentially. Nevertheless in discussion of the supply of uranium to Euratom there should be borne in mind the latest developments relating to the French request for a bilateral agreement covering the supply of uranium to France. The treaty constituting Euratom, incidentally, is expected to be signed, probably on March 14, together with the Common Market Treaty; the two are politically related within the general context of the six-power European integration movement.

For well over a year French authorities have expressed interest in obtaining uranium from Canada, and it emerged some time ago that they would not wish the uranium supplied to be subject to controls. On February 18 Mr. Howe announced the general terms on which the Government is prepared to conclude bilateral agreements covering the supply of uranium for peaceful uses. That same week, as it happened, the French Ambassador and a senior official of the French Atomic Energy Commission called on Mr. Léger to explain the French position in detail. France would be prepared to purchase the relatively small quantity of uranium which Canada could now make available to France; but this amount would constitute only about 10% of the uranium available to France from domestic resources. We have some reason to believe that France already is or soon will be engaged in the development of atomic weapons, a supposition which the remarks of Mr. Lacoste and his colleague did nothing to dispel. Regardless of the end use intended, all uranium used in French atomic reactors will for the foreseeable future have to be processed after irradiation in a single plant where its origin will become undetectable, and accordingly effective controls on any part of that uranium would in practice involve inspection of all or most of the entire French programme and could not be limited merely to the uranium which might be supplied by Canada. Understandably enough, the French Government is not prepared to permit Canada to exercise such controls. They are, however, prepared to provide full assurances that the purely peaceful part of their programme will use a substantially greater portion of the total uranium available to them than the relatively small fraction which might be provided from Canada.

Hence the French request is that Canada provide uranium to France without controls but with assurances that more than the quantity of uranium supplied by Canada will be used for peaceful purposes only. It is suggested that this will meet the Canadian requirement that uranium exported from Canada will not be used for military purposes (except, by special agreement, by the United Kingdom and the United States).

The policy recently announced by Mr. Howe on behalf of the Government is not really applicable to such a situation. Although the explicit limitation is that uranium supplied by Canada shall not be used for military purposes, the underlying assumption was that uranium would be supplied to countries not engaged in a weapons programme. The situation of a country such as France which might want Canadian uranium for peaceful uses while having uranium available from other sources for a weapons programme was not considered. The supply of uranium in these circumstances, even though for peaceful uses, would indirectly assist the weapons programme by increasing the total quantity of uranium available to the country in question for its combined military and civil programme. The particular French request gives rise to an additional problem in that it would require us to accept assurances in place of actual inspection and control, thus requiring in turn a political judgment on each individual application of this type which might be received. The announced Canadian policy was designed to be universally applicable, with the requirement for controls eliminating the need for such political judgments.

These same problems, unfortunately, would appear likely to arise in connection with the supply of uranium to Euratom if it comes into being in the form now contemplated. Originally it was proposed that countries acceding to the Euratom treaty would renounce the production of atomic weapons, and that all fissionable materials available to the community would be controlled by a central purchasing agency with safeguards to ensure that no such material was used for any military purpose. As France was not prepared to give up the right to produce atomic weapons, however, the other prospective members have apparently accepted (with greater or lesser reluctance) a totally different concept. According to our most recent information there will still be the central purchasing agency controlling all available fissionable materials and allocating them by agreement among the various national programmes on the basis of requests from the individual member governments. Such requests, however, may relate to either peaceful or military uses, and provided it is collectively agreed to meet them the production of weapons may be undertaken by one or more member governments within the general framework of Euratom's programme. (A special limitation applies in the case of Germany, which is precluded by the Paris Agreements of 1954 from the production of atomic weapons). Hence the supply of uranium to Euratom or to any individual member of that community could indirectly assist the production of atomic weapons by increasing the total supply available for allocation to both peaceful and military uses within the community as a whole.

The preceding paragraphs carry some implication that the production of atomic weapons by France or other countries of Western Europe is undesirable. It has certainly been the position of the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada that the widespread or uncontrolled production of atomic weapons should be prevented if possible. In negotiations about a year ago relating to the establishment of the International Atomic Energy Agency, representatives of the United Kingdom and United States Governments expressed the view that the production of atomic weapons by any country other than those already making them should be opposed. Canadian representatives were not so categorical, so as to preserve a flexible position for the Canadian Government to determine its future course in the light of developments.

It may be questioned, however, whether this general situation still exists. For some two years NATO plans have developed on the assumption that atomic weapons would be used in a full scale war, and that NATO forces should be in a position to use them. This implies that forces of other NATO countries, as well as those of the United Kingdom and the United States, should be trained to use these weapons and should be provided with them in the event of war. In recent months developments have taken place which appear likely in due course to bring this new situation into being, possibly to lead eventually to the stockpiling of atomic weapons in the hands of forces of a number of NATO countries. It might be difficult, in such circumstances, to continue to oppose the production of such weapons by countries like France (or even Germany) which would be expected to use them and might be in a position to make their own.

Moreover, France has domestic supplies of uranium and if she is determined to do so can make atomic weapons with or without the approval of other governments. It is possibly in recognition of this fact, and on the ground that if France is going to make such weapons anyway it would be desirable to have her do so by collective agreement rather than in isolation, that the United States in announcing its support of Euratom has promised explicitly that the proposed community need never run short of atomic fuel. This commitment must surely have been made in awareness of the fact that the Euratom treaty will permit the production of atomic weapons by member countries, and that the provision of fuel to the community would facilitate such production.

As a final consideration, it should be pointed out that a decision on the part of Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States to condone or assist the production of atomic weapons by countries of Western Europe would have profound effects upon the general concept of international control of atomic resources. That concept, as embodied in the Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency, implies that all countries should be prevented or impeded from producing atomic weapons. It was accepted with reluctance by many governments, in particular those of under developed countries led by India; these critics pointed out that it was inequitable in that an exception had of necessity to be made for the three great powers (the United Kingdom, the United States and the U.S.S.R.) already producing atomic weapons. If that exception were to be extended to include NATO countries in Western Europe, it would be regarded as an extension designed to cover the white colonial powers and discriminate against the under developed and anti-colonial countries. The effects upon the International Agency and upon co-operation in atomic and other matters with these countries would undoubtedly be serious.

It would therefore appear that the supply of uranium by Canada either to France or to Euratom would raise a number of important political questions which have not as yet been considered by the Government. In these circumstances it would perhaps be advisable, in discussions with M. Mollet, to give some general indication of the complex political questions involved and to avoid any explicit commitment. Mr. Lacoste has already been told that the French request mentioned above is not directly covered by the policy recently announced by Mr. Howe, and would require important political decisions concerning which the Government would probably consider it necessary to consult the United States and the United Kingdom. It would appear desirable that there should be such consultation fairly soon, since several Western European countries (including, incidentally, West Germany) are pressing for agreements to cover the supply of uranium. Even if others are prepared to accept Canada's announced terms (as seems quite probable) it would be well to have a clearer position on the French request before coming to a decision on others. In all of this, as indicated above, the present views of the United States and the United Kingdom are by no means fully known or understood.

SECRET [Ottawa], April 23, 1957

PROBLEMS RELATING TO THE EXPORT OF URANIUM

The discussion at Mr. Bryce's meeting this morning will be based on the question of what conditions Canada will impose on the export of uranium under various circumstances.

2. Canada exports uranium to the United States without conditions concerning the use to be made of it, and will shortly do the same for the United Kingdom. It is known that both countries conduct atomic weapons programmes and that the supply of uranium from Canada directly or indirectly assists those programmes. On the other hand, Canada has announced that she is prepared to conclude agreements with all "friendly governments" for cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy, to cover in particular the supply of uranium by Canada. The Government has stated that such agreements will include provision for safeguards adequate to protect against diversion to military use.

3. France wishes to supplement its domestic production of uranium by importing a certain amount from Canada, and is unwilling to accept the application of safeguards to this import. France has pointed out that the Canadian and French uranium would be merged in the French programme, that to be effective the safeguards would have in practice to apply to this entire programme, and that the Canadian uranium would be only some 10% of the total. France is not prepared to accept foreign controls on her entire atomic programme in return for a marginal increase in her uranium supply. Underlying this situation is the fact that France reserves the right to produce atomic weapons and may indeed have got fairly well on with the prerequisite research and development. As an alternative, however, France has offered to give formal assurances that the quantity of uranium used for purely peaceful ends will exceed the amounts which may be supplied from Canada.

4. In summary, therefore, France would like to obtain Canadian uranium, as do the U.S. and the U.K., without any conditions, but if necessary is prepared to give assurances that any uranium which may be supplied from Canada will be less than that used in France's peaceful programme. France will not accept safeguards, and will not give assurances that she will have no military programme which the Canadian uranium might directly or indirectly assist.

5. The paper prepared in the Privy Council Office after the last discussion of these matters is directed to the general problem raised by the French request. Assuming that the ultimate objective is to discourage the production of atomic weapons by "fourth powers" such as France, or failing that to ensure that Canada shall not assist such production by any "fourth power", the paper proposes a course which might well help to solve the particular difficulty about export of uranium to France and at the same time meet another problem which has arisen in the NATO context. It is suggested in essence that the United States should undertake to provide atomic weapons for defence purposes as NATO mutual aid and subject to the various checks applicable to such aid. This would meet the NATO requirement that NATO forces be prepared if necessary to fight an atomic war, would provide fairly effective restraints against unilateral or irresponsible use of these weapons by other NATO countries, and, as a major point, would create a situation in which other NATO countries might easily be induced to defer any plans they might have for producing such weapons themselves.

6. The paper suggests that in these circumstances it would be possible to supply uranium to other NATO countries subject to safeguards, as such countries having no military atomic programme could accept this requirement. This suggestion may be considered optimistic. The objections to safeguards on the part of uranium importing countries are several, and by no means all dependent upon the wish to be free to produce atomic weapons. Particularly in the case of France, but no doubt for others also, there is a prestige factor of importance. To accept safeguards means allowing an outside power to determine what you can and cannot do; it involves a derogation of sovereignty. In the case of France it means accepting a status inferior to that enjoyed by the United States and the United Kingdom. Effective safeguards, moreover, are burdensome and costly; there is little doubt that Canada would expect the cost to be added to the purchase price and paid by the recipient government. Finally, other NATO governments would probably take the line that in return for U.S. atomic weapons they are foregoing manufacture themselves; in these circumstances Canada should be prepared to take their word for it, particularly when we are joint members of an alliance of which the defence planning requires that they should have access to such weapons. To illustrate the fact that reluctance to accept safeguards does not depend directly upon the intention to produce weapons, it may be mentioned that Switzerland and India (neither of which is likely in the foreseeable future to attempt to produce atomic weapons) have both declared that they will not accept controls upon natural uranium. Indeed in the broader international context, the considerable opposition to safeguards has focussed sharply on the consequent interference in peaceful activities and no country other than France has shown any concern at the direct result of being deprived of atomic weapons.

7. At this point there should be recalled Canada's object in proposing that safeguards be applied to the export of uranium for peaceful use. Many countries, if they were prepared to undertake the expense of producing atomic weapons, could probably find the necessary uranium domestically. For most, such domestic supplies would be substantially more expensive than uranium obtained from established producers, but this difference in cost might well be relatively small (for a programme of modest volume) in comparison with the very heavy cost of producing the weapons. Canada's object was not solely to prevent or discourage the production of atomic weapons by "fourth powers". Perhaps more important was the hope of establishing a pattern which would permit international trade in uranium (and indeed other atomic commodities) for peaceful use to take place widely on a normal commercial basis. Such a pattern, with automatic assurance that the use would in fact be peaceful, would permit sale to almost any country without the necessity for a difficult and uncertain political decision on each individual application.

8. It was therefore considered important that the requirement for safeguards should be applied universally as far as possible, whether or not it was considered necessary in every case to have that complete assurance against military use. Each exception would make it more difficult to insist on safeguards in other cases. The exceptions for the U.S. and U.K. could be readily explained on two counts, the historic tripartite partnership of the last war and the fact that Canada was prepared publicly to assist atomic weapons production by those two countries. But to make further exceptions would put the whole policy in jeopardy; France would be followed by Germany, then by other NATO countries, and if the white colonial powers of Europe were to obtain uranium without controls it would become very difficult politically to apply them to others.

9. Mr. Pearson's comments on the Privy Council Office paper (attached) show that he quickly recognized this difficulty. He referred to India and Pakistan and asked how we can distinguish between NATO and other friendly states. His question actually related to the possession of atomic weapons, not the supply of uranium without safeguards, but there is a close parallel. In either case, an answer might be that membership in NATO involves a specific obligation to assist in the collective defence programme, both nationally and through mutual aid, and that this obligation is the justification for applying towards NATO members policies not applicable to other friendly states which have not accepted such mutual defence obligations.

10. To sum up these observations, it may be noted that atomic weapons could become available to NATO forces, without their production by "fourth powers", through their supply by the United States. This in itself would be desirable. If, as a result, other NATO countries (including France) were willing to accept safeguards on uranium supplied from Canada, this would be an additional benefit. It is questionable, however, whether this latter result could be obtained; it seems more likely that several western European countries will not accept safeguards. If this proves to be the case, Canada would have to face an unpleasant choice; one course would be to hold to the requirement for safeguards and probably lose attractive markets either to other less scrupulous suppliers or to high-cost uranium produced domestically by the would-be purchasers, while the other would be to forego the requirement for safeguards and probably see uranium soon become available to all countries without any international control over its use and with non-economical factors determining price to the detriment of market stability.

11. The meeting will no doubt consider whether this choice has now to be faced, or whether some synthesis can yet be achieved. It may also wish to give preliminary consideration to the draft bilateral agreement (copy attached†) designed to incorporate effective and virtually complete safeguards. This draft was circulated a few days ago to those attending the meeting.

Draft Memorandum from Privy Council Office to Ministers

The Immediate Problems

Canada has for some time been concerned to confine the possession and manufacture of nuclear weapons to as few countries as possible. We have pursued this end because of the clear danger to peace which will result if these weapons are possessed by unstable or irresponsible governments. The Canadian government has not yet, however, formulated a policy in regard to its own requirements for nuclear weapons, nor has it considered what might be the need of NATO member nations other than the U.K. and the U.S. These problems have now been brought sharply forward because of difficulties which have arisen concerning the export of Canadian uranium.

2. It has been intended that Canadian uranium would be sold to purchasers, apart from the U.S. and the U.K., under bilateral agreements which would limit the use to peaceful purposes and would apply controls to this end. These controls would either be operated by the International Agency for Atomic Energy, if that is agreeable to the purchaser, or by Canada on a basis consistent with control standards set forth in the Agency's statute. A public statement to this effect was recently made by the Minister for Trade and Commerce.

3. It has been realized that sooner or later it would be necessary to decide whether or not Canada was prepared to sell uranium for use in weapons by friendly countries other than the U.S. and the U.K. It was considered, however, that such a decision should and could be separated from any decision relating to the export of uranium for peaceful purposes. In fact it has been Canadian policy to make a clear distinction between the supply of uranium for peaceful purposes and the supply of it for weapons. Only in the case of the U.S. has any decision been made with regard to supply for the latter purpose.

4. Nevertheless Canada is about to enter into contracts with the U.K. to supply uranium for peaceful purposes, and these contracts are being made in the knowledge that the U.K. will also be purchasing uranium for weapons' purposes. In this case, and contrary to our present policy, no effort is being made to distinguish the uses to which the U.K. purchases might be put and to apply safeguards. Indeed where a weapons' programme exists the application of safeguards to a part of the uranium supplied would be pointless, and it does not appear possible for Canada to maintain consistently the distinction referred to in the preceding paragraph.

Present Policy and the Attitude of France

5. It now appears necessary for a decision to be made as to whether Canada is willing to assist, either directly or indirectly, in the acquisition of nuclear weapons for defence purposes by the European members of NATO. A decision in principle will have a direct effect upon Canadian policy for the export of uranium. This is well illustrated by a request from France[17] to purchase 50 tons of uranium for peaceful purposes. France has reserved the right to undertake an atomic weapons' programme, and as a result this right has been recognized for any member under the draft treaty for Euratom. The proposed purchase by France will constitute about 10% of her atomic fuel requirements. All irradiated fuel rods will be processed in one plant for the extraction of plutonium; therefore any controls which Canada might wish to exercise would have to be exercised over the whole French programme. The French government cannot accept such controls. Instead it offers to guarantee that at any given time more than 10% of its uranium — i.e. more than the amount supplied by Canada — will be devoted to peaceful purposes.

6. However it is quite clear that in this case, or in the case of any purchaser that might embark on an atomic weapons' programme, the amount of uranium supplied by Canada could in effect release an equivalent amount for military purposes. Such an effect would be inconsistent with the stand which Canada has taken in the international negotiations for control provisions in the statute of the International Agency. On the other hand a refusal to supply uranium to friendly[18] nations might adversely affect the export of an important Canadian product,[19] and might only be to the advantage of less scrupulous suppliers.[20]

& India [J. Léger]

Views of Officials on the Central Issue

7. A group of officials has met to consider these problems and has reached the conclusion that it would be dangerous to pursue any policy which would indirectly assist additional countries to embark on an atomic weapons' programme. In particular the group was of the opinion that every effort should be made to prevent the manufacture of large strategic weapons and the development of forces designed to deliver them. Nevertheless it did not seem possible to deny to our NATO partners the right in principle to possess atomic weapons.[21] It did seem possible, however, that in practice this right might effectively be limited to the possession of short range weapons of limited power designed for defensive and tactical purposes. The possession of only limited weapons is less likely to cause a country to embark on a dangerous military adventure, and less likely to cause a potential enemy to take preventive action.

Canadian and NATO Weapons' Requirements

8. Any decision as to what policy Canada might pursue to limit the possession of atomic weapons among our NATO partners must take into account what our own requirements may be. Before long a decision will have to be taken as to whether Canada will use nuclear anti-aircraft weapons as the U.S. airforce does in the air defence of North America. If the decision is that we shall require these weapons, then we can hardly pursue an effective policy that would prohibit them to our NATO partners.[22]

9. The group of officials has noted that at the NATO Council of Ministers held in December 1956, the U.S. Secretary of Defence stated his government was now prepared to make available certain new weapons to member nations for tactical defensive purposes. These include the Honest John, Nike and Matador missiles which would not, however, in the first instance be armed with atomic warheads. It is believed that this represents the first stage of a plan whereby eventually the U.S. government will be prepared to provide their NATO partners with atomic warheads — thus providing NATO with an atomic potential to be used for tactical purposes as contemplated in SACEUR's plans. At present U.S. units within NATO already possess these weapons.

Proposals for a New NATO Policy on Nuclear Weapons

10. It appeared to the group of officials that Canada could support in principle a policy designed to provide our NATO partners other than the U.K. and the U.S. with tactical nuclear weapons for defence purposes.[23] Within the framework of such a policy NATO members could reserve their rights with respect to an atomic weapons' programme. In practice, however, they might be expected to find it unnecessary to divert their atomic programmes from peaceful purposes, both because of economic considerations and because of the desirability of all members having standardized weapons. It is true that economic considerations did not prevent the U.K. from embarking on a weapons' programme, but this was begun at a time when the U.S. government was not prepared to provide the kind of assistance that now appears possible. A policy of the kind set out above would in fact satisfy the real requirements of NATO members, it would permit the prestige that goes with the possession of nuclear weapons, and would not create in as acute a form the political difficulties which in countries such as France would beset a government that abandoned the right to a weapons' programme.

11. The readiness of NATO members to accept this proposal might be sharpened if it appears to them that only by exceptional economic sacrifices could they obtain the larger nuclear weapons. It would therefore seem advisable that tactical nuclear weapons should be provided to NATO members by the U.S. under mutual aid and consequently subject to the usual right of inspection. If the provision of tactical weapons were made subject to the right of inspection, and if any country embarking upon a weapons' programme of its own were required under the agreement to return to the U.S. all tactical weapons provided under mutual aid, an important incentive would be provided to countries such as France to abandon its plans[24] for the manufacture of weapons.

Effect of the New Policy on Uranium Export from Canada

12. If such a policy were successful it would then follow that Canada could sell uranium to NATO member countries for peaceful purposes under bilateral agreements which would require the application of controls consistent with those set forth in the statute of the International Agency. This would be possible because under the proposed policy the countries would not in fact have weapons' programmes. A clause in each bilateral agreement could make the continued supply of uranium contingent upon revision if at any time the other party to the agreement informed the Canadian government that it intended to embark on a weapons' programme; the agreement could be similarly revoked by Canada if intelligence sources indicated that a country intended to undertake the manufacture of weapons without announcing its intentions.

Effect of the New Policy on Non-NATO Countries

13. The group of officials considers that in any sales of uranium made outside the NATO area — for instance, to India — Canada should continue to insist on the requirement for controls. It is recognized that non-NATO nations would be likely to raise objections on the grounds that since they were not included in the provision of tactical atomic weapons, and since they were permitted to purchase uranium for peaceful purposes only, their power to defend themselves was being unreasonably reduced.[25] It seems possible that this attitude might at least be moderated if aid for the development of peaceful programmes is made sufficiently attractive. The possibility also exists that some additional countries might be supplied with tactical weapons by the U.S. under other alliances — particularly if it appears that the U.S.S.R. is supplying such weapons to peripheral nations.

[25] Note marginale :/Marginal note:

Implementing the New Policy

14. If the Canadian government is disposed to consider this policy, a preliminary step would seem to be consultation with the U.K. and the U.S. It seems unlikely that the U.K. would be able to resist the logic of this approach to the problem in view of their attitude expressed at the Prime Ministers' conference in June of last year, their arguments in support of their current reduction of forces, and their desire to supply reactors and reactor parts to their European neighbours. It seemed probable to the group of officials that an approach might be made to U.S. officials by informal discussions through diplomatic and military channels.

15. It is suggested that after careful consideration Canada might be in a position to give impetus to this plan by itself accepting the principles on which it is based. This would mean a decision that in so far as Canada required tactical nuclear weapons for defence purposes it would obtain them from the U.S. rather than by manufacture. Canada would, however, still reserve its right in principle to manufacture nuclear weapons if at any time it wished to do so. An assessment of the cost of these weapons would have to be made, and a further decision would be required as to whether we were prepared to pay the U.S. for them or whether they should be obtained from the U.S. under mutual aid or some loan arrangement.

16. In order to provide a clear intention of good faith, it is proposed that Canada should be prepared to supply the raw uranium content of any nuclear weapons provided by the U.S. to its NATO allies. Thus as a supplier of uranium Canada could not be accused of promoting this plan in order to enlarge its sales. A practical way for Canada to make this contribution would be by bearing on our Mutual Aid Vote an appropriate amount of the cost of the uranium being furnished to the U.S. However, before making any firm commitment to this effect, we should have to explore carefully the anticipated costs involved.[26]

Matters for Decision

17. The group is of the opinion that its recommendations represent a practical solution which may effectively prevent the uncontrolled development of atomic weapons' programmes, meet Canada's own defence requirements, and permit the exercise of consistent controls in accordance with the provisions of the statute of the International Agency within the limitations imposed by the defence requirements of the western allies.

18. Decisions would seem to be necessary on the following points:

(i) Does the government accept the view that the most practical method of preventing the development of large strategic weapons by NATO members other than the U.K. and the U.S. is by a policy facilitating the possession of smaller tactical weapons?[27]

(ii) Should Canada encourage a policy whereby smaller tactical weapons are supplied to NATO members by the U.S. under Mutual Aid?

(iii) Does Canada contemplate the use of tactical atomic weapons, and would it accept the same position as other NATO members under the proposed policy for the supply of small tactical weapons?

(iv) Should Canada, after an examination of the financial considerations involved, give impetus to the proposed policy by offering to supply under mutual aid uranium for tactical purposes to be furnished to NATO members?

(v) Should Canada open informal exploratory talks with the U.S. and the U.K. with a view to obtaining their views upon the policy suggested?

(vi) If this policy were to be followed could Canada insist upon the exercise of controls over uranium sold (a) to NATO members other than the U.K. and the U.S., and (b) to non-NATO countries?[28]

Editorial Note

Les efforts interministériels déployés pour rédiger un mémoire acceptable par les ministres ont continué pendant les six semaines suivantes et ont donné lieu à trois autres volumineuses ébauches d'exposés de principes. L'idée de demander aux membres de l'OTAN de renoncer à leur droit de fabriquer des armes nucléaires a été abandonnée peu après les élections fédérales de juin 1957 pour des raisons qui restent obscures après consultation de la documentation. (Dans les dossiers MAE 14002-2-6-40 et BCP R-100-1-U.) Les fonctionnaires ont préparé par la suite un mémoire sur l'exportation d'uranium, plus concis et de portée sensiblement plus limitée, qui a été présenté aux ministres en août 1957. Il sera réimprimé dans le volume 24. Le problème de l'exportation d'uranium dans les pays susceptibles de fabriquer leurs propres armes nucléaires a fait également l'objet de discussions avec le gouvernement britannique lors des entretiens de Saint-Laurent avec Macmillan dans les Bermudes. Voir le volume 22, document 735.

The inter-departmental effort to draft an acceptable memorandum for ministers continued for the next six weeks and resulted in three more lengthy draft position papers. The idea of asking NATO members to renounce their right to manufacture nuclear weapons was abandoned shortly after the June 1957 federal election for reasons which are not clear from the files. (This material is located on DEA 14002-2-6-40 and PCO R-100-1-U.) Officials subsequently prepared a shorter, and much less ambitious, memorandum on the export of uranium that was presented to ministers in August, 1957. This will be reprinted in Volume 24. The problem of exporting uranium to countries likely to manufacture their own nuclear weapons was also discussed with the British during St. Laurent's meetings with Macmillan in Bermuda. ATOMIC ENERGY; AMENDMENT TO [1955] CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT ON CIVIL USES OF ATOMIC ENERGY

10. Mr. Martin, as Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs, reported that an amendment to the bilateral agreement with the United States on the civil uses of atomic energy, to provide for the exchange of a somewhat wider range of information, had now been negotiated. President Eisenhower had approved the proposal, as the law required. The amendment had to be before Congress for thirty continuous sitting days before it could come into effect and, owing to the fact that Congress might rise somewhat earlier this year than usual, it had been decided, with the approval of the Prime Minister, to authorize the Canadian Ambassador in Washington to sign it as soon as possible, on the understanding that matter would be reported to Cabinet at the first opportunity. He recommended that this report be noted and that signature of the amendment be formally approved.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, June 20, 1956—Cab. Doc. 135-56)†

11. Mr. Martin added that it was quite possible that certain minor changes might be proposed by the U.S. in this amending agreement. He suggested that Mr. Heeney have authority to sign as long as there was no major change in substance.

12. The Cabinet noted the report of the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs on the amendment to the Canada-United States bilateral agreement on the civil uses of atomic energy, and confirmed that the Canadian Ambassador in Washington, or his deputy, was authorized to sign the amendment; but that formal authority for this purpose be deferred pending the receipt of the actual text as finally approved.[29]

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 4-56 Ottawa, January 4, 1956

Tariff negotiations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade will open in Geneva on January 18th, 1956. The Contracting Parties to the General Agreement were informed, in pursuance of the Cabinet decision of July 19th, 1955,[1] that Canada proposed to participate in these negotiations.

As a result, an exchange of requests for tariff reductions has taken place with a number of other Contracting Parties. It appears that there is a basis for a fairly narrow but profitable negotiation with the United States and that there is some possibility of conducting useful though limited negotiations with other Contracting Parties, namely: Austria, Benelux, Cuba, Denmark, Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Norway and Sweden. The purpose of these negotiations would be to reach agreement on tariff reductions on a mutually advantageous basis. The results of these negotiations would be submitted to Cabinet for approval.

It is recommended that the Delegation should consist of the following:

Head of the Canadian Delegation
- Mr. L.D. Wilgress

Head of negotiating team
- Mr. Maurice Schwarzmann (Department of Trade and Commerce)

Alternate head of negotiating team
- Mr. Rodney Grey (Department of Finance)

Other members of the Delegation
- Mr. R.E. Latimer (Department of Trade and Commerce)

[1] Voir/See Volume 21, Document 121.

- Mr. J. Loomer (Department of Trade and Commerce)
- Mr. B.S. Shapiro (Department of Trade and Commerce)

with an adviser to the Delegation to be appointed from the Department of Agriculture should that Department think it desirable.[2]

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Cabinet

TARIFF AGREEMENTS NEGOTIATED UNDER THE GATT

On July 22, 1955 Cabinet approved Canadian participation in tariff negotiations with the United States under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and on January 11, 1956 Cabinet approved the appointment of a delegation to negotiate with the United States and with a number of other countries. These negotiations, which opened in Geneva in January, 1956, have now been completed and a number of agreements have been initialled by the Canadian negotiators. The results of these negotiations are outlined in this Memorandum for the consideration of the Cabinet.

The agreements concluded at Geneva are now being considered by Governments. They are to be signed formally on May 23rd, and are to be kept secret until June 7th.

2. Results of the Negotiations

This conference at Geneva was the fourth general round of multilateral tariff negotiations under the GATT. These negotiations were of a more limited character than previous GATT tariff negotiations for reasons that were well understood in advance. Some twenty-five countries including the major trading countries, participated in these negotiations. Canada negotiated and concluded agreements with the United States and twelve other countries. These agreements will result in a moderate reduction of tariff barriers over a wide field and in practical benefits for Canadian exporters of many products in various markets. In addition to the benefits of agreements negotiated directly by Canada, Canadian exporters will gain from the wide range of tariff concessions which participating countries negotiated with each other and which are extended to Canada by the application of the most favoured nation rule.

The concessions agreed to in the Canadian tariff, are, in the main, in Canada's own interest. Well over half the concessions were ones which had been considered for possible inclusion in recent Budgets, and which had been deferred with this negotiation in mind. Bindings of existing rates of duty, rather than reductions, were negotiated to a greater extent than in previous negotiations, and a number of Canadian concessions were negotiated with more than one country. It is not anticipated that the concessions granted by Canada will create difficulties for Canadian producers.

[2] Approuvé par le Cabinet le 11 janvier 1956./Approved by Cabinet on January 11, 1956.

3. The United States

The agreement concluded between Canada and the United States was one of the major agreements resulting from this conference, and contributed substantially to the success of the conference. As will be recalled, the United States Administration was limited in its negotiating powers to granting maximum reductions of approximately 15 per cent of present rates, to be implemented in three stages of 5 per cent over the next two years. This delay in the full implementation of United States concessions was taken into account by Canadian negotiators in determining the nature and extent of the concessions that Canada could offer, on the understanding that Canadian concessions would probably come into effect in one step. The negotiations between Canada and the United States were difficult and protracted, but agreement was reached on the broadest possible basis. This agreement is clearly in Canada's interest and to the mutual advantage of both countries.

United States concessions to Canada in this agreement covered about 100 products. Canadian exports of these products to the United States amounted to $158 millions in 1954. Benefits to Canada resulting from United States agreements with other countries covered, in addition, some fifty items in which trade in 1954 was about $10 million. Maximum reductions were secured from the United States on all the items of real interest to Canada on which the United States Delegation was empowered to negotiate. Almost all the items on which Canadian industries had made specific requests for tariff concessions in the United States are included in the agreement. There were many other items, of course, on which Canada had requested tariff reductions but which the United States had excluded from the negotiations. In particular the United States was not prepared to negotiate on any important agricultural or fisheries items. The concessions obtained are all reductions of approximately 15 per cent of present rates, to be implemented in three annual stages as required by United States legislation. The full reductions will be in effect on or about July 1, 1958.

The United States list of concessions includes a number of chemical products, such as synthetic rubber, vinyl acetate, vanillin, barytes and a number of chemical compounds; a number of metals, including crude aluminum and its alloys, aluminum bars and sheets, steel ingots and billets, ferro silicon; a few agricultural products, such as lettuce, turnips, hay, blueberries; some paper products, such as book and printing paper, wrapping paper and hanging paper; a number of more highly processed products, such as manufactures of aluminum, of iron and steel, of wood and of glass and various types of machinery and electrical goods.

As indicated above, Canada offered a higher proportion of bindings of existing rates of duty than had been negotiated at previous conferences. The trade covered by all Canadian concessions to the United States, including bindings of existing rates, amounted to about $85 million in 1954. Of the 132 tariff items involved, the two principal ones — textile machinery and orange juice — involved no loss of protection to Canadian producers. Of course, the views of other Commonwealth Governments were sought as these concessions involved reductions in margins of preference. No concessions were offered in chemicals, primary iron and steel and other products which are now being investigated or are about to be investigated by the Tariff Board. Canada did not grant concessions on any of the more sensitive products, and many of the major concessions granted (such as textile machinery, orange juice, shrimps and oysters, beer, eviscerated turkeys, lettuce and cauliflower, as well as a number of manufactured products not made in Canada) were concessions which were quite clearly in Canada's own interest and many of which had been requested by Canadian firms or organizations.

4. Europe

Canada concluded seven agreements with the following European countries: Austria, the three Benelux countries, Denmark, Germany, Italy, Norway and Sweden. These agreements are of a very limited character, but nonetheless they will serve in some degree to improve and stabilize Canadian exports of a considerable variety of products to these markets. There were very few specific requests from Canadian industry for tariff concessions in Europe. However, it was felt that some useful gains could be made in improving the terms of access of Canadian exports to European countries and, in addition, it was considered important to demonstrate again Canada's interest in further strengthening trade relations with other countries as well as the United States. The European countries appeared to be impressed with the willingness of Canada to try to conclude agreements on the widest possible basis.

Among the more useful concessions obtained by Canada in its agreements with the European countries were: The elimination of duty on salt codfish, flaxseed and woodpulp in Italy; the reduction of the tariff on lumber, methyl alcohol and canned salmon in Benelux and on spark plugs in Denmark; duty reductions on outboard motors, canned lobsters and whisky in Germany and on synthetic rubber and nylon fishing nets in Norway. In addition to these concessions secured directly by Canada, Canada will benefit significantly from the large number of tariff concessions granted by the European countries in their negotiations with the United States, the United Kingdom and among themselves.

In return for these concessions, Canada undertook to bind a number of existing rates of duty, and also negotiated reductions which had been offered in the first place to the United States. It was found possible to offer reductions in the tariff on goods which were of particular interest to various European countries, e.g., mouth organs and cameras negotiated with Germany, cherries in brine, tomato paste and tobacco pipes negotiated with Italy. A valuable concession Canada was able to offer Benelux was the binding of the existing statutory rate on window glass, which is considerably below the rate previously negotiated.

The European countries recognized that they would get at least as much from Canada through successful Canadian negotiations with the United States as they could get directly, and thus they were willing to grant concessions directly to Canada in return for reductions which Canada was negotiating primarily with the United States.

5. The Caribbean Area

Canada negotiated agreements with Cuba, the Dominican Republic and Haiti. In the case of these three countries the objective of the Canadian negotiators was to attempt to find concessions in the Canadian tariff on items other than rum and sugar, which were excluded from the negotiation because of the general problem of our relations with the British West Indies. Because of this, the negotiations with these countries were somewhat difficult and necessarily limited in scope. Nevertheless, some concessions of practical value to these countries were found, and small but useful agreements were concluded. The principal concessions offered to Cuba were a binding of the existing duty on rayon fibre used in the manufacture of tires, and a reduction of the duty on high value cigars and cigar tobacco. Other concessions negotiated with the Caribbean countries included reductions of duties on papayas and pineapple in brine, certain manufactures of palm straw and other tropical fibres, green coffee used for the manufacture of coffee extract and dried bananas.

While the Caribbean countries recognized that a real effort had been made to find concessions of interest to them, it may be expected that they will continue to press strongly for improved terms of access to the Canadian market for their major exports.

Among the concessions granted to Canada by the Caribbean countries are duty reductions on aluminum sheets, phosphorus and linseed oil in Cuba; a binding against increase on toys in the Dominican Republic; a duty reduction on oatmeal, and a binding of the duty on salt fish in Haiti.

6. United Kingdom

Canada did not negotiate with the United Kingdom. However, as a result of negotiations conducted by Canada and by the United Kingdom with third parties, both countries made limited reductions in preferential margins on a number of products of interest to each other. Informal consultations between Canada and the United Kingdom with respect to margins of preference were held throughout the negotiations, and each country took the interests of the other fully into account in deciding what concessions to grant. The reductions in preferential margins made by Canada and the United Kingdom are generally small and no significant changes in preferences will result from this conference.

The most important reduction of preference made by the United Kingdom from Canada's point of view is a moderate reduction on kraft paper negotiated with the Scandinavian countries, but the remaining preference in favour of Canada is still substantial. The preferences in the Canadian tariff which have been reduced are relatively minor with the exception of the 5 per cent preference on textile machinery. It is clear, however, that the United States already dominates the market for this product and that the 5 per cent preference was not ensuring United Kingdom sales to Canada but had become a tax on Canadian users. (Two preferences in the Canadian tariff of interest to Australia and one preference of interest to South Africa were also reduced, but this was done only after careful consultation with those countries).

7. Procedure

When previous negotiations of this kind took place the substance of the agreements concluded was submitted to Parliament on the publication date agreed upon by all the participating countries. Opportunities were provided subsequently for discussion of the agreements in Parliament. No legislation is required; the tariff changes are put into effect by Order in Council under the Customs Tariff.

8. Recommendations[3]

I recommend, with the concurrence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance, that:

(a) Cabinet approve the eleven agreements which have been negotiated at Geneva and initialled by the Canadian delegates,

(b) Mr. L.D. Wilgress be authorized to sign the Protocol of Supplementary Concessions to the GATT (in which these agreements are embodied),

(c) The Canadian Schedule of Concessions be published on June 7, on which date the other countries' Schedules will also be published, and

These recommendations were approved by Cabinet on May 17, 1956.

(d) At the time the Schedules are published a statement be made in Parliament and to the press, and copies of the agreements be tabled.[4]

SECTION B

ONZIÈME SESSION DES PARTIES CONTRACTANTES
ELEVENTH SESSION OF THE CONTRACTING PARTIES

810. PCO

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le Cabinet

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], October 2, 1956

The Eleventh Session of the Contracting Parties to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade begins in Geneva on October 10th. This will be one of the regular business sessions which take place periodically to administer the Agreement, to consider complaints and to seek solutions of particular points of difficulty. A number of important matters will be discussed and it has been suggested that governments may wish to send Ministerial representatives to attend the Session for a few days.

It is desirable that a Canadian Delegation should be appointed to participate in the work of this Session, to represent Canadian interests and to seek, as in the past, to strengthen the GATT arrangements and make them as effective as possible.

(a) Attendance of Ministerial representatives at this Session — It has been suggested that a meeting of Ministerial representatives at this Session would serve to strengthen the prestige and effectiveness of the GATT. This matter was discussed by the GATT Intercessional Committee, meeting in Geneva last month. There appeared to be considerable interest in this proposal, particularly among some of the underdeveloped countries and the European countries. It was felt that such a meeting would provide a valuable opportunity for direct contacts between Ministers from various parts of the world, and, also, that some of the items on the Agenda were of sufficient importance to warrant the presence of Ministerial representatives at this Session. In view of this response, it would seem desirable that Canada should support this proposal. If a sufficient number of governments are in favour which is by no means certain, it has tentatively been agreed by the GATT countries that arrangements will be made for a meeting of Ministerial representatives to take place in Geneva November 12—16.

It would be desirable for Canada to undertake to send a Ministerial representative to the GATT Session, but only if a sufficient number of Ministerial representatives from other governments will also attend. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has asked his Parliamentary Assistant whether he could attend if such a meeting takes place.

(b) Balance of Payments Consultations—On the initiative of the United States and Canada, the Agenda for the GATT Session calls for the institution of a series of consultations with a number of countries which are still maintaining discriminatory import restrictions. It is felt that with the considerable improvement in the balance of payments position of a number of European countries in recent years the time has now come for an effective series of consultations aimed at obtaining some relaxation of these restrictions. Among the countries which would be invited to consult, Germany and The Netherlands particularly would appear to be in a position to make substantial progress in the removal of restrictions. It is clearly in the Canadian interest and in the interest of strengthening the GATT arrangements that some effective action should be initiated for progress in the field of import restrictions. This is particularly the case at a time when no further progress in the tariff field can be expected, as far as the United States is concerned. It is also of importance to obtain further action in the removal of dollar discrimination in Europe at a time when European countries are discussing regional trade arrangements.

The Canadian Delegation should take an active part in arranging for balance of payments consultations under GATT, in ensuring that these consultations are made as effective as possible and that the GATT Secretariat is adequately equipped to administer them.

(c) European Customs Union and Free Trade Area—The proposals for a European common market for the association of the U.K. and other European countries in a free trade area raise issues of major importance in the field of international economic policy. It would appear desirable at an early stage to try to ensure that these proposals are kept as consistent as possible with the multilateral objectives of the GATT. Canada and the United States have therefore proposed that at this Session of the GATT there should be a discussion of methods of establishing continuing liaison between the GATT and the European regional plans.

The Canadian Delegation should support appropriate arrangements to provide for effective liaison between the European regional discussions and the GATT.

(d) Accession of Switzerland to the GATT—Switzerland has now made a formal application for accession to the GATT and this will be considered at the coming Session. Switzerland's accession as a full member of GATT at this time raises problems because of the existence of Swiss agricultural import restrictions which are in conflict with the provisions of the GATT. Because of this it has been proposed that Switzerland should be accepted only as an associate member of the GATT at least for the time being. It has to be recognized that this would be another instance of the exclusion of trade in agricultural products from the GATT rules. In other products, however, Switzerland is a strongly liberal trading country, and on balance Swiss accession would therefore be valuable to the GATT.

In these circumstances the Canadian Delegation should welcome and support the accession of Switzerland as an associate member of GATT, on terms which will not create undesirable precedents.

(e) Brazilian Tariff Revision—Brazil will be submitting at the coming session a new draft tariff for consideration by the GATT countries. The Brazilian draft tariff provides for substantially higher levels of duties for most imports into Brazil.

The Canadian Delegation should not adopt an unduly negative attitude towards the Brazilian problem but should participate in devising a formula which would enable Brazil to implement tariff increases while protecting Canada's trade interests as much as possible.

At the same time, the Canadian Delegation should try to ensure that no action is taken with respect to Brazil which would cause substantial injury to the GATT.

I recommend that the Delegation be instructed:

(a) to participate in the discussion of Agenda items, to represent Canadian interests and to seek, as in past, to strengthen the GATT arrangements and render them as effective as possible;

(b) to indicate that Canada will be prepared to send a Ministerial representative to attend the Session, on the understanding that a sufficient number of representatives of Ministerial rank from other governments will also attend;

(c) to make appropriate arrangements for balance of payments consultations under GATT with a view to obtaining some further progress in the removal and relaxation of discriminatory import restrictions;

(d) to make arrangements for continuing liaison between the GATT and the European regional discussions for a customs union and free trade area;

(e) to support the accession of Switzerland as an associate member of the GATT on suitable terms;

(f) to participate in the discussion of the Brazilian tariff problem, seeking a solution which will do as little damage as possible to the GATT and to Canadian trade with Brazil, on the understanding that further instructions will be sought from Ottawa, if necessary.

I recommend that, as on past occasions, the Chairman of the Canadian Delegation should be Mr. L.D. Wilgress (who will no doubt be re-elected Chairman of the Contracting Parties); that Dr. C.M. Isbister of the Department of Trade and Commerce and Mr. A.B. Hockin of the Department of Finance should be Vice Chairmen of the delegation; that the following officials from Ottawa should be included in the delegation:

Mr. J.F. Grandy	–	Department of External Affairs
Mr. R.E. Latimer	–	Department of Trade & Commerce
Mr. L.C. Howey	–	Department of National Revenue
Mr. J.R. Downs	–	Department of Trade & Commerce
Mr. J. Loomer	–	Department of Finance and that Mr. C.F. Wilson, Commercial Counsellor at Copenhagen, should assist the delegation as may be necessary, and that Mr. G. Clark and Mr. H. Jay of the Canadian Permanent Mission to the United Nations, Geneva, should be attached to the delegation.[5]

[5] Ce mémoire au Cabinet n'a pas été mis en circulation. Au lieu de cela, Howe a présenté un exposé oral sur la réunion du GATT au Cabinet le 3 octobre 1956. Le Cabinet a convenu que Howe, Pearson et Harris allaient choisir « the composition of the delegation and the form and content of the instructions for it ». Puisque ces trois ministres ont souscrits à ce mémoire, il est probable que la version finale des instructions, qui n'a pas été trouvée, ait suivi ce texte de près.

This memorandum to Cabinet was not circulated. Instead, on October 3, 1956, Howe made an oral presentation on the GATT meeting to Cabinet, which agreed that he, Pearson and Harris would settle "the composition of the delegation and the form and content of the instructions for it." As this memorandum was concurred in by these three ministers, presumably the final version of the instructions, which were not located, closely followed this text.

TELEGRAM EE-38 Ottawa, October 11, 1956

GATT CHAIRMANSHIP

Following personal for Wilgress from Léger: We have learned from New Delhi that the Indians are rather embarrassed as they had promised to support Corea of Ceylon when it appeared you would not be standing. We have checked with Colombo and find that Ceylonese are quite anxious to have Corea elected and, despite their regard for you, feel that Western countries have occupied the chair long enough. Delhi has also indicated that there may be some manoeuvering to get Oldini of Chile elected. I should be grateful for your views on this situation.

2. I know how highly your work as Chairman of the GATT has been regarded in Canada and in other member countries. In refraining from approaching you again, after your earlier indication that you did not wish to serve another term, we were not lacking in appreciation of the good work which you had done and could continue to do as chairman. We had in mind mainly fact you had carried the load for rather a long time, that Indian candidate was regarded by you and others as very competent, and that you were going to have a heavy programme in Paris with NATO and the OEEC (which will not be lighter with initiation of discussions on free trade area/customs union project).

3. I understand that when you indicated to the United States the circumstances in which you would be willing to stand again, you emphasized that you would be prepared to do so only if this was the general wish. I suppose, therefore, the judgment which has to be made now is whether your candidacy might be resented by some or even whether the election is likely to be warmly contested (by Corea, Oldini, or others). I should be grateful to know what your attitude would be in either event. I should also appreciate your views on the probable outcome if you were not to stand. I take it that Corea would not be too unacceptable from our point of view (although less satisfactory than Jha might have been if the U.S. could have brought themselves to accept him). On the other hand, Oldini (or other possible Latin American candidates of whom we have any knowledge) would presumably be more unsatisfactory.

4. I realize that you are confronted with a difficult choice. If you feel that you should stand, it would seem desirable that the U.S. and U.K. (without giving impression that you were particularly "their" candidate) should attempt to influence the others who may be thinking of running. If on the other hand you concluded that, in all the circumstances and in view of your responsibilities in Paris, it would be preferable not to serve again, we would not consider it fair to press you. We would wish to be guided by your best judgment in the light of all the factors, which are more familiar to you than to us.

GATT CHAIRMANSHIP

Following for Léger from Wilgress: Your telegram under reference was received shortly before I had to leave Geneva for Paris. It was somewhat corrupt but I derived the sense of your message.

2. I telephoned Corse of the USA delegation and asked him to come and see me. I told him I would have to withdraw because the condition I had set was not being fulfilled. I explained how it might interfere with my work in Paris; further that political overtones were being given to the contest as one between Western and Eastern countries; and finally, since another member of the Commonwealth was involved, the contest was embarrassing for us. It had been different when both India and Ceylon had nominated candidates.

3. I told Corse I wanted to withdraw immediately. He asked me to wait until I returned to Geneva from Paris on Wednesday as he wished to consult Washington in order that they might plan their further moves. He said they regarded the Corea candidacy as motivated mainly by personal ambition. They were convinced that the majority were for no change in the chairmanship and this majority included Brazil, Cuba and Pakistan. Haguiwara of Japan is now taking informal soundings and the picture should soon become clear.

4. The question of the chairmanship is being discussed in closed meetings of Heads of Delegations. The chair is taken by Haguiwara. Only one meeting has been held so far and the first part of that meeting was presided over by me and was taken up with a discussion of the threatened retirement of the Executive Secretary about which I told Ritchie when he was in Paris. When the subject of the chairmanship was reached there was only time for four speeches. Sweden and the USA in that order spoke in favour of no change at the present time which was so critical for the future of GATT. France then spoke at length in favour of the introduction now of the principle of rotation. France took the same attitude at the review session and, while some are inclined to attribute this to their general disruptive tactics, the French representative claims it is based on their customary attitude in all international organizations. (No doubt he would say that OEEC was the exception that proved the rule.) Indonesia was the fourth speaker and they supported the French position.

5. The meeting adjourned sine die since Haguiwara wished to take soundings before resuming the discussion. The terms of office for the chairman and vice-chairmen are for one year and do not expire until October 27.

6. I was definitely not anxious to serve for a further term and agreed reluctantly only because I felt it was essential in the interests of GATT which is now in difficulties and is threatened further by the recent bold moves in Europe. Hitherto, I have not experienced too much difficulty in covering both Geneva and Paris. This has been through the judicious exercise of priorities.

7. I am disturbed by the concern you obviously feel about the political implications. I fear the situation as viewed from Ottawa may seem more alarming than as seen in Geneva. I have consistently tried to weigh the political factors in the actions I have taken.

8. I can give you little information about the possibility of Oldini emerging as a rival candidate to Corea. I and the other members of our delegation are keeping aloof from the discussions that are going on behind the scenes. Corse said that, while Oldini was more acceptable politically to the USA than Corea, they could make no move in his support until instructed to do so by Washington. Corse repeated what he had told me in September and said that the opponents of the Trade Agreements Act would contend that American tariff policy was being directed from Ceylon. This could set off agitation for the withdrawal of the USA from GATT which would result in their rates of duty being raised to the level they were at in 1947. He said he had done his best to persuade his superiors to accept Jha but they had always referred to the ammunition this would give to the opponents of the programme.

9. The issue now being debated is no change of officers at present versus the immediate introduction of the principle of rotation. In practice the latter alternative means the election of a representative of one of the under-developed countries, either an Asian or a Latin American. In theory the field is wide open because the choice had been left to the Heads of Delegations. The Intercessional Committee recommended against formal nominations. Hence the nomination of Corea has no official standing. Oldini has strong personal claims in that he has been connected with GATT continuously for ten years and has served three years as First Vice-Chairman. While I would give a slight preference to Corea, most representatives would find it difficult to decide between the respective merits of these two possible candidates. I am on the friendliest terms both with the exceptionally able Ceylon Minister of Commerce, who is attending the Session, and with Sir Claude Corea whom I have known for the past nine years.

GATT CHAIRMANSHIP

Following for Wilgress from Léger: I am grateful for your message which gives me a good idea of how complex the situation is with respect to the election of the chairman. I was reassured to learn from your paragraph 7 that the political implications of this situation are not as serious as they might seem to be from here. You can be sure that I have never had any doubt concerning your ability to weigh the political factors involved in determining the course of action which you should take. I would only wish we could be equally sure that our U.S. friends were fully sensitive to these factors. Needless to say we are content to rely on your judgment of the situation as it develops.

2. Shortly after I had read your message I received a visit from Livy Merchant, who had called earlier in the day to make an appointment. His purpose was to emphasize how highly your work with the GATT was regarded and how much his people in Washington (and he thought also the people concerned in most other capitals) hoped that you would accept to be a candidate again. You could be sure of the support of the U.S. and he was certain that the U.S. would be impressing other delegations with the desirability of re-electing you. He did not think that, in the case of an organization such as the GATT, the principles of rotation need apply. The subjects dealt with in the GATT were both so technical and so important that there were real advantages in having an able and experienced chairman. Merchant hoped very much that we might encourage you to stand for re-election.

3. I told Merchant that we did not consider ourselves in a position to press you to stand again. We were aware of the condition — which we endorsed — you had set for your re-election and we knew of the responsibilities which you have elsewhere; on the other hand we did not know enough of the real factors in the situation in Geneva. Accordingly, we thought that the decision had to be left to your own judgment on the spot. I promised however to pass on to you the comments which Merchant had made.[6]

Dear Mr. Secretary:

Some weeks ago, when the Governor of the Bank of Canada called on you, he outlined at my request certain ideas we had developed relating to the organization of the Executive Board of the International Monetary Fund and the position of its Managing Director. I understand that you were receptive to our suggestions, sharing our view that the Executive Board has not functioned satisfactorily. For your convenience I enclose a memorandum which summarizes our position.

Wilgress continued to resist pressure to seek re-election as Chairman of the Contracting Parties, and he was replaced as Chairman by Corea at the inter-sessional meetings. No report on these meetings was located.

I have communicated our proposals to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and I am glad to be able to tell you that, in principle, he regards them with considerable sympathy.

I would be hopeful that these suggestions might also commend themselves fairly readily to the others who are chiefly concerned, and that they would be very much in mind when the new Managing Director is chosen and, of course, when the new Board of Executive Directors is elected in September. If it became clear that the post of Managing Director was to be more interesting and more responsible it should be possible to get a better man than might otherwise be available.

Yours very truly,

Memorandum

VIEWS OF THE CANADIAN MINISTER OF FINANCE ON THE ORGANIZATION OF THE INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

1. The difficulty which is being experienced in finding a suitable man to assume the post of Managing Director of the International Monetary Fund on the retirement of Mr. Rooth has led us to wonder whether the time has not come to consider changing the method of operation of the Executive Board in a way which would give more scope for leadership to the Managing Director, improve the chances of attracting a first class man to the post, and enhance the real influence of the Fund. The following paragraphs outline the ideas we have developed on this matter.

2. The Executive Board of the Fund is in continuous session in Washington and consists of sixteen directors and the same number of alternates. With the exception of the Canadian, German and Egyptian Directors, and of course the United States Director, they do not have operating responsibilities in the financial field in their own countries. The others reside in Washington and are "professional" Directors, though some have other national responsibilities as well. This arrangement of full-time Directors has, in our opinion, had a number of undesirable consequences:

(a) It has diminished the authority of the Managing Director in relation to his own staff. The Board has tended to interfere in matters of internal administration, including appointments and promotions. It has been apparent to the staff that the Managing Director has not been master of his own administration, and this has inevitably affected the morale of the staff. The contrast between the Fund and the Bank in this respect is particularly striking.

(b) Discussions in the Fund Board have not been as fruitful or well-informed as would be the case if they were carried out by people who had some national operating responsibilities for the matters discussed. Some of the Directors have conceived their function to be merely to express personal opinions. Others have reflected their government's views, but discussion based largely on written instructions has inevitably included less give-and-take and had less influence on national policies than discussion among practitioners. One of the reasons why the Managing Board of the European Payments Union has, as an institution, been relatively successful is that that Board is composed of people who continue to have operating responsibilities in their national governments and central banks.

(c) With the Executive Directors in continuous session and with the Managing Director in a relatively weak position, countries have hesitated to discuss their affairs with the head of the Fund before there was actual need to obtain Fund approval for some action or for use of Fund resources. This may, in fact, be the main disadvantage of the present arrangements, as it means that the Fund influence is not brought to bear at an early stage where it could have a major effect on national policies. The Managing Director should be encouraged to establish relationships with Treasuries and central banks in which his counsel is sought because it is known to be competent and disinterested. This is feasible, however, only if there is complete assurance of secrecy; and the present organizational arrangements militate against this.

3. It is our belief that a change in the way in which the Executive Board functions which afforded more scope for initiative and leadership to the Managing Director and which changed the nature of the representation of the main countries would make the Fund a more influential institution, and would increase the chances of getting a man of the calibre required to take the post of Managing Director. The more successful operation of the International Bank has been due in part to the opportunity for leadership given to the President following the adoption in 1950 of the recommendations of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Functions of Executive Directors presided over by Governor Frère.

4. The change we have in mind could be accomplished without amending the Articles of Agreement or the by-laws. All that would be needed would be agreement of the principal countries (say the United Kingdom, United States, and the main Western European countries) that this was the way they wanted the Fund to operate, and that they would appoint or put up for election as Executive Directors next September people who would make it operate in this way, i.e. a senior official from the treasury or central bank of each such country who normally participates in the formulation and carrying out of economic policy, particularly in relation to foreign exchange and foreign trade. (If other countries decided to do the same, so much the better. But distance presents a greater obstacle in some other cases, and uniformity is not essential.) Meetings of the Board to discuss important policy issues would be scheduled a limited number of times a year, perhaps quarterly, and the Executive Directors representing the more important countries would normally be expected to come from their national capitals to attend. The system of alternates would continue; they could deal with routine business, and emergencies requiring Board action could be dealt with if necessary on the basis of telegraphic reference to capitals. However, it would be agreed that the internal administration of the Fund would be left to the Managing Director and he would be encouraged to cultivate relationships with member governments along the lines referred to above.

5. A further advantage of holding meetings a few times a year attended by senior officials would be the opportunity thereby provided for discussions and exchange of opinion on many matters of interest in the financial field besides those coming strictly under the aegis of the International Monetary Fund. While European countries enjoy these facilities in connection with meetings of the Managing Board of the European Payments Union, the Bank for International Settlements and other institutions, the proposed adoption of similar practices with regard to the International Monetary Fund would be of great benefit to Canada, the United States and other non-European countries, and by the same token it might be beneficial for European countries that the United States officials and others should be kept informed and have an opportunity to talk things over with their European opposite numbers.

PERSONAL & CONFIDENTIAL. Ottawa, June 7, 1956

Dear Mr. Secretary:

I wrote you two days ago to set before you in more or less formal terms the gist of our ideas regarding changes in the organization of the Executive Board of the International Monetary Fund and the position of its Managing Director.

A further development, of which you may perhaps have heard from your officials, is that Mr. Baumgartner, Governor of the Bank of France, showed very great interest in and approval of our proposals when they were outlined to his in Paris this week by Mr. Rasminsky. I am encouraged to feel, therefore, that progress can be made with changes in the organization of the Executive Board more or less along the lines which have been discussed. I would have in mind putting these proposals forward in the Annual Meeting in September.

Mr. Rasminsky also had the impression that if organizational changes could be made along these lines, Mr. Baumgartner himself might be available for the post of Managing Director, although perhaps not until the end of this year.

However that may be, it is our feeling that further progress should be sought in connection with the proposed organizational changes before the Annual Meeting. It would be an advantage if member countries were able at that time to select their Executive Directors with the thought in mind that the new method of operation would be going into effect shortly thereafter. Otherwise, if there is delay, it might be necessary for some of the chief countries concerned to change their Executive Directors at some time during the normal two year term of office. To avoid the necessity for this would seem to be clearly desirable, although not absolutely essential.

I would also hope that the organizational changes could be at least agreed in principle by the chief countries represented on the Board of the Fund before the appointment of a successor to Mr. Rooth as Managing Director. I would think this would be desirable even if it involved some short delay in the appointment of his successor. There would be great advantage in having the situation clarified first so that the new man would know what the organizational arrangements would be before being required to make up his mind to accept the post.

I understand that subsequent to Mr. Coyne's talk with you two further names have been actively considered, namely Mr. Guindey and Mr. Jacobsson. From what we know and what we have heard, we are not convinced that either of them has to a sufficient degree the qualities that we think should characterize the Managing Director and Chairman of the Executive Board of the International Monetary Fund.

Yours sincerely,
W.E. HARRIS

PERSONAL London, June 16, 1956

Dear Jim [Coyne],

The uneventful meetings of the Continuing Committee wound up yesterday and I now have the opportunity to write you in detail about my discussions regarding the Fund.

As you know, when I saw Baumgartner in Paris on June 4 he expressed great enthusiasm for our ideas regarding the way the Fund should function, said that he thought the attempt to find a successor to Rooth should be postponed until after these organizational proposals had been adopted and indicated that he would speak to Cobbold along these lines at Basle on June 10. He also gave me clearly to understand that if the Fund were reorganized along the lines we have to mind, he might well, towards the end of the year, be willing to re-consider his own previous negative attitude towards the job of Managing Director.

At Basle during the week-end, I spoke to Frère of the Banque Nationale de Belgique, Holtrop of the Netherlands Bank, Emminger of the Bank Deutsche Länder (I shall speak to Vocke in Frankfurt next week) and Manichella of the Bank of Italy. I had also had in mind speaking to the Governor of the Swedish Riksbank, but there were so many Scandinavians there (all represented by one Executive Director on the Fund Board) that it would have been impossible to talk to them all, and I thought it better not to talk to any.

The reception of our ideas was most encouraging. The Germans, of course, already operate the way we do, and Emminger and I have frequently talked about the matter in the past and I expected, and am sure we will get, support from this quarter. Frère was positively enthusiastic about the proposals. Holtrop was first inclined to question whether the Fund could in any circumstances be an active and influential institution. His main points seemed to be that the resources of the Fund were unlikely to be needed to any great extent, as fluctuations in balances of payments were less than was often assumed, and until convertibility was established, countries would not go to the Fund on any large scale, as drawings in all currencies had to be re-paid in dollars. He did not stick very strenuously to these points, and expressed general agreement with our organization proposals which he undertook to discuss with the governmental people in Amsterdam. Manichella was more reserved. He first said the matter of leadership was more a question of personality than organization and cited the example of Black. I was, of course, able to point out the differences in the way the Bank Board and the Fund Board operated. He then said that while he agreed entirely that the Fund was not functioning satisfactorily, the matter went deeper than organization; what was needed was a fresh look at what we expected the Fund to do. To give this fresh look he thought there should be one or more meetings of a limited group of countries. I said that I agreed that a re-appraisal of the sort he had in mind would be a good thing, but pointed to the difficulties of this being undertaken by a limited group of Fund members operating outside the Fund. I said that Mr. Harris intended to bring our ideas on organization up for discussion at the September meeting and this would be the right time and place for a discussion of the type he had in mind. He was satisfied with this and undertook to let others concerned in Italy know about our ideas.

I gave Baumgartner, Frère and Holtrop copies of the memorandum of May 31. I mentioned it to Manichella but did not give him a copy. However, after leaving Basle he telephoned from Bern and asked if he could have one and I have sent one to him in Rome. I shall give Vocke a copy in Frankfurt.

Both Frère and Holtrop said that while they agreed with the proposals, they thought they could not be put into effect, so far as they are concerned, as early as September. The difficulty is that they must find something else for their present Executive Directors, van Campenhout and Lieftinck, to do and more time would be required.

In talking to all these people I said that it was the Canadian view that the organizational matter should be settled before Rooth's successor was chosen. I did not however discuss names with anyone except Baumgartner.

On June 11, Cobbold asked me to have dinner with him and we had a long talk about these matters. His view is strongly that the matter of organization will take quite a long time to work out and that the appointment of a new Managing Director should not be postponed until then. He contests our view that the field of choice will be widened if the Fund is reorganized in a way that gives more scope for initiative and leadership to the Managing Director. He says that the only real starter whose name has come up is Jacobsson and he does not think new names will come up after re-organization. The new man, if he is any good, will insist on re-organization along our lines but he will have to be satisfied with general assurances from the U.S., U.K., etc. that this is the way they want the Fund to operate; the new man should, in fact, put the re-organization through. It would be awkward and embarrassing to leave the chair at the top of the table empty for the length of time required to get general agreement. As for Jacobsson himself, Cobbold agreed that he was far from being the ideal candidate and it was obvious to me that the British were a good deal less than completely enthusiastic. However, he had his points. He had "glamour" (Cobbold must use the word in a rather special sense); he had the entrée to European central banks; he would be acceptable to the under-developed countries; he could talk down Berstein and Friedman; Black was keen on him as well as the U.S.

By the time this conversation took place, Cobbold had already spoken to Jacobsson and when I ascertained this I said there was not a great deal of point in my continuing to elaborate the reasons we thought him unsuitable — the U.K. and U.S. knew what our views were. I refrained from saying that we would not oppose him (or that we would oppose him) if his name was formally placed before the Executive Directors. About an hour after we parted at midnight, Cobbold roused me from a deep slumber to ask why I did not speak to Jacobsson myself. I said of course, because I would have nothing to say to him on this subject. I did in fact spend a couple of hours with Jacobsson the next day but it was entirely on the state of the world and the references to Canada in the Annual Report of the B.I.S. These have to be seen to be believed. Reference 1. — "Certain overseas countries, in particular New Zealand and Canada were beset by balance of payment difficulties in 1955". Jacobsson explained that what Canada needs now is a good little slump. But that is another story that can await my return.

Cobbold assures me that the U.K. will definitely not have Overby as Deputy Managing Director and have gone on record to this effect with the Americans.

Baumgartner failed to speak to Cobbold in Basle as he said he would and I phoned him from London, and asked him whether he had given further thought to the matter. He said that he had read our memo and personally agreed completely with it, though he did not think the Managing Director of the Fund could ever be quite as powerful as the President of the Bank (which is true). I asked him whether he was still of the opinion that the choice of Managing Director should be postponed until the re-organization was through, as this might improve the selection. He simply said "that is a delicate question" and told me that he had made "des réserves" on the choice of Jacobsson. I am afraid Baumgartner has to be counted out as neither the U.S. or U.K. would be willing to make a fresh approach to him, and I can't say I blame them.

Here in London, Ken Taylor arranged a meeting with Rowan at which Harcourt and I were present. Essentially the same ground was covered. Rowan had other reasons for not having the top post vacant — the U.S. might want to wind up the Fund, several directors had said that they would be unhappy about serving under Cochrane as Acting Managing Director. There was even less enthusiasm for Jacobsson and Rowan agreed with me when I said that we Canadians were still in the same position as everyone had been in when they first heard his name mentioned but that the U.K. and U.S. had changed. Rowan asked me whether I thought the Deputy had to be an American. I echoed the phrase in your cable† to Cobbold about him not being a custodian of American interests and said the post should not be in the gift of the U.S. Government, but went on to say that I felt quite definitely that with the top man a European it was most desirable that the Deputy should be an American.

The U.K. and U.S. are now going to trot Jacobsson around the track and see how much support they can get for him.

I think that the present position can be summarized as follows:

(1) Our own ideas regarding organization, or something like them, stand a very good chance of ultimately being adopted. However, the U.S. and U.K. insist on the new Managing Director being chosen first and will not consider pushing the other matter until this is done. Rowan said they might discuss organization of the Fund informally at the next meeting of the O.E.E.C. Council. I doubt that they will but shall, in any case, send a copy of the May 31 memorandum to Dana Wilgress; I mentioned the matter to him when I was in Paris. I do not think, failing real U.S. and U.K. support, that there is any real hope that enough progress will be made this summer on the organizational side to influence the choice of Executive Directors in September. When I get back we ought to consider what else we can do to push the matter along. I have in mind the following possibilities:

(a) Talking to some of the other Executive Directors, e.g. from Australia and India.

(b) Talking to people in the Federal Reserve System and perhaps State Department.

(c) The Canadian Government communicating its views formally to some members of the Fund.

This would prepare the ground for Mr. Harris' intervention to the Fund discussion in September.

(2) The British and Americans must be given time to collect the bets on Jacobsson. I would not make a book on him myself, even though the big money is on him. He does not have solid support from his own Western European stable (the French still backing Guindey) and it would surprise me if he was the choice of the underdeveloped. However, he certainly is the favourite as of this moment.

(3) If Jacobsson does not finish, the British will probably shift back to Guindey. The more I think of Jacobsson, the better I like Guindey.

My travel plans are unchanged. I shall be at the Frankfurter Hof in Frankfurt.

Though I have marked this letter personal, I am sending a copy to Jack Warren and shall show a copy to Norman Robertson.

I trust all goes well with you,

With warm regards, etc.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL. Washington, June 20, 1956

Dear Mr. Minister:

I have your letters of June 5th and 7th outlining your ideas about the reorganization of the Executive Board of the International Monetary Fund and the position of its Managing Director. I note that you have in mind putting these proposals at the Annual Meeting in September and that you hope there can be agreement in principle on the changes by the chief countries before the appointment of a successor to Mr. Rooth.

Of course, I should be glad to see the caliber of the representation on the Executive Board of the Fund maintained at the highest feasible level and we recognize the problems you have in mind. However, I have misgivings concerning the advisability of raising this question at the Annual Meeting. As you have said in your memorandum, the changes you visualize could be accomplished without amending the Articles of Agreement or the By-Laws. Hence, no action by the Governors is required. I'm afraid any formal move in the direction you suggest involves delicate political problems, and it seems particularly unlikely that the Latin American, Middle Eastern and Asian countries will respond favorably. As we look over the membership of the present Executive Board, we are inclined to think that the most that might be expected is that more senior representation could be achieved in the case of two or three Directors from Europe. This can be arranged by the European countries themselves if they so desire.

It does not seem to me necessary to link the question of possible reorganization of the Executive Board with the search for a new Managing Director. I am confident that the right kind of Managing Director will have no difficulty in exercising the leadership which you and I both have in mind. He should have little difficulty in gaining the confidence of the Executive Board and in rearranging its work so that he will have adequate flexibility. However, I do not believe it is feasible to work such matters out in advance of experience with the new Managing Director.

Mr. Burgess and I believe that Per Jacobsson has an almost unique prestige in the field of monetary affairs and that he can bring to the Fund as Managing Director and Chairman of the Board a very high order of leadership. We want to follow up this possibility promptly and hope that after further reflection you will feel that you can concur in our opinion.

Sincerely,

G.M. HUMPHREY

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL. Ottawa, July 23, 1956

Dear Mr. Secretary,

Thank you for your letter of June 20th in reply to mine about the International Monetary Fund. I shall, of course, have very much in mind the views you express. The one matter which I wish to refer to in this letter is the advisability of my raising the question of the method of operation of the Executive Board at the Annual Meeting in September.

The next Annual Meeting is the tenth anniversary of the Fund and I suggest that it is inevitable, and indeed desirable, that the general discussion should range over a wide field and constitute a sort of stock-taking of the Fund. In the course of such an appraisal, the Fund's working methods would appear to be a proper subject of discussion, and I would hope that it would be possible to deal with this question in a way that did not offend any country's susceptibilities. Indeed, I see no reason why the countries you mention in your letter should not welcome a change in working methods if it has the effect of increasing the effectiveness of the Fund and strengthening the position of the international staff. It is, of course, the case that some of the Executive Directors now representing the countries you have in mind may have a vested interest in maintaining the present arrangements but I am sure that you will agree that this should not be given too much weight.

There is another reason why it strikes me as desirable to bring this question out into the open. One of the purposes of these proposals is to increase the influence of the Fund by changing the attitudes of member countries towards the institution. If this is to be done, it would seem necessary that members should realize that a quite important change is taking place which goes beyond the replacement of "professional" full-time Executive Directors by a few countries, and includes basic changes in the Fund's working methods.

I shall naturally be giving further thought to these matters before September but I wanted to let you know how my mind was moving now.[7]

Yours sincerely,

W.E. HARRIS

Le directeur canadien suppléant, Fonds monétaire international au sous-gouverneur de la Banque du Canada

Alternate Canadian Director, International Monetary Fund, to Deputy Governor of Bank of Canada

CONFIDENTIAL [Washington], December 13, 1956

Dear Lou [Rasminsky],

This is a report on the Board meeting you attended on December 10 when the Executive Directors approved a U.K. drawing of U.S. $561,470,000 (its gold tranche and first credit tranche), together with a Stand-by arrangement for the U.K. in the amount of U.S. $738,530,000 equivalent. Taken together, the drawing and the right to draw under the stand-by amount to $1,300,000,000, or 100% of the U.K.'s quota.

For ease of reference I attach the U.K. request to the Fund (EBS/56/44), the staff analysis and conclusions (EBS/56/44, Supplement 1), the text of the Stand-by Agreement as approved (EBS/56/44, Supplement 2), the Fund's announcement of its decision and the accompanying public statement by the Managing Director.† I am circulating separately the staff's background paper on the U.K. economy (SM/56/83).

Viscount Harcourt, in putting forward his government's submission, commented favourably on the presentation of the U.K. case in the staff papers. He recognized that in asking for full use of its quota a very large sum was involved; however, this was considered necessary in all the circumstances, and more particularly because of the confidence factor. It was, he said, the U.K. intention to draw the $561 million more or less immediately; no decision had as yet been taken about the currencies to be purchased if drawings were to become necessary under the Stand-by. However, if this question did arise, the U.K. intended to consider carefully "what currency or currencies might appropriately be drawn in the circumstances."

Harcourt's analysis of the internal situation of the U.K. followed closely that in the staff papers. His general line was that the inflationary pressures in the U.K. were diminishing as a result of the various fiscal and monetary measures which had been taken and that the fundamental outlook was rather better than it had been in the last year or so. He noted a marked slackening of consumer expenditure, a considerable fall in house building, the switch from the production of domestic consumer goods to capital goods and to exports, and the easier labour situation (although the situation was still characterized by full employment). The problem of wages was, he admitted, still difficult. However, there had been a noticeable change in the climate in which wage negotiations were taking place. The pressure for wage increases from the Trade Unions was more gentle than in earlier years and the employers, because of the less inflationary conditions, were resisting wage claims more strongly than in any of the five previous years.

On the external side, also, Lord Harcourt suggested that the basic position had considerably improved. During the first half of the year there had been a current payments surplus of £144 million which, however, had not been fully reflected in the movement of the reserves because sterling balances had fallen. Exports had been rising steadily during 1956 and by value were running 10% above last year. As to the competitiveness of U.K. exports, about which questions had recently been raised in certain quarters, it was to be noted that sales to the dollar area, which was perhaps the world's most competitive market, were up 30%, or 20% above the average increase in exports generally.

In line with the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement in the House of Commons on December 4, Harcourt's conclusion was that the pressure on the U.K. reserves and on sterling, which had been experienced in varying degrees since the end of July, arose not from a fundamentally weak U.K. economic position but was accounted for by the international situation, the effects of which were especially evident on sterling, a currency which was widely held and used, both for trading and for reserve purposes, and which financed over one-half of the world's trade. He went on to emphasize the magnitude of the strain to which sterling was exposed in a situation of international tension when confidence fell. While it was not possible to measure accurately the impact of "leads and lags" on sterling, it had been estimated that in the 1949 crisis this factor had accounted for a loss of between $700 million and $1 billion. Another way of looking at the problem was to appreciate that the turnover of the sterling area with the rest of the world was of the order of £1,000 million per month; with such turnover it was evident that a very small movement in confidence could give rise to heavy pressure on reserves.

Turning to the more immediate economic consequences of the disruption of traffic through the Suez, Harcourt commented on the staff estimate that there would be a deterioration in U.K. current payments on oil account of the order of £125 million in the period up to June 1957. This figure, he said, could be no more than an informed guess (and he asked that it not be quoted outside the Fund). It was very difficult to make a calculation of this kind in view of the many factors involved, some of which were counter-balancing. Loss of oil to the U.K. would cause hardship and inconvenience, but if the short-fall could be held to 25% of normal consumption, he thought it was unlikely to have a substantial adverse effect on industrial production. If the short-fall was much in excess of this amount, however, the effects on production would be disproportionately large.

In summing up, Harcourt said that the U.K. need was to overcome the temporary disruption of its payments position. Time would be required to reverse the confidence movement against sterling and to allow a further period for the fiscal and monetary measures which had been taken fully to work their way through the economy. It was for this reason that Fund assistance was required. In this connection the Chancellor had said that it was the U.K.'s intention to maintain the present parity of the pound, to avoid the reimposition of external controls and to follow fiscal credit and other policies designed to strengthen the economy both internally and externally. As regards the drawing, the U.K. intended to abide by the customary terms of repayment to the Fund. He was satisfied that once confidence in sterling had been re-established there would be a reversal of recent capital movements and that with the immediate difficulties overcome, the U.K., as a result of the various measures which had been taken, would be earning a substantial balance of payments surplus from which repayment to the Fund could be made.

As regards other resources which might be mobilized to reinforce the reserves, Harcourt referred to the Chancellor's statement that he was prepared to use the U.K.'s dollars securities, valued at between $750 million and $1 billion, as collateral for borrowing from the appropriate agency of the U.S. government (the Ex-Im Bank) and that the U.K. had been assured that if requested support in the form of a loan against these securities would be promptly available. He said this matter was now being pursued and Southard confirmed the assurance which had been given by the U.S. government.

The consensus of the Fund Board was so overwhelmingly in favour of meeting the U.K.'s requests and the reasons given for so doing were so similar in most cases, that it is unnecessary to report in detail what each Director said. Nonetheless, certain features of the discussion should be recorded, including the position taken by Southard, the U.S. Executive Director.

Southard said he fully supported the U.K. request for reasons which were almost too obvious to require mention. Sterling was a very important international currency and all countries had an interest in its stability. He noted, particularly, the great disadvantages of a situation in which the U.K. and other countries were forced to reimpose severe restrictions. The U.S. did not consider that the concept of the Fund as embodied in the Articles of Agreement and the "key currency" approach to the world's international monetary problems were mutually exclusive and felt that in backing the U.K. request on this occasion this was being clearly demonstrated. The Fund was proving itself capable of recognizing the importance of sterling and of acting resolutely to bolster it up. Failure would involve disastrous consequences. He accepted the analysis of the staff that the measures which had been taken by the U.K. to restore its economic position were beginning to bear fruit and that the immediate difficulties were of a temporary nature arising from confidence factors. It was noteworthy that the U.K. in the first half of this year had maintained its share of the world market for exports of manufactured goods. It was his hope, when the current difficulties had been overcome, that the U.K. would go on to regain a greater proportionate share of this important sector of the international market. In conclusion, he said his government fully supported both the drawing and the stand-by; the assistance forthcoming from the Fund and otherwise should serve to reverse the capital movements to which sterling had been subject and give time for the basic measures which had been taken in the U.K. to have their required effect. If the requested support was not forthcoming from the Fund it could not be expected that these measures would have the opportunity to prove their effectiveness.

The overwhelming support which Southard gave to the U.K. request was indicative of, and perhaps partly explained, the near enthusiasm of most members of the Board in agreeing to the Management's proposals. For an afternoon, it seemed that the customary caution and equivocation of most Directors had been thrown out the window; the unqualified willingness to back up sterling, although most marked in the case of Directors representing the main sterling area countries, was almost universal. Speaker after speaker emphasized the key role of sterling and the necessity for the Fund to rally to its support. Somber and dramatic pictures were painted of what might happen if confidence in sterling were not restored. No one openly questioned Harcourt's contention that the U.K. difficulties were temporary and that the fundamental position was sound.

Callaghan, speaking for South Africa and Australia, thought it was self-evident that when sterling needed support the doors of the Fund's vault should be thrown wide open. From his point of view it was as much the Fund as the U.K. which was on trial. If the Fund failed to support sterling as requested, the institution might as well close its doors! The Indian, in giving wholehearted support, emphasized the good which would be done for the world as a whole. The French representative thought the amount and character of the U.K. request appropriate to the need and expressed the hope that with the Fund's assistance the U.K. would overcome its difficulties. Paranagua accepted the U.K. analysis of the situation and believed it was vitally important to take all measures to restore confidence. He recalled the difficulties of the 30's, the importance of avoiding their recurrence and welcomed the fact that on this occasion the I.M.F. was available with its resources to deal with the kind of situation which had arisen. This thought about the importance of the Fund being available to see the U.K. through its temporary difficulties was echoed by Watanabe, the new Japanese Executive Director, by Lieftinck and by others.

In your statement, you underlined the importance of the U.K.'s announced determination to avoid the reimposition of restrictions. According to Watanabe, this factor had also weighed heavily with the Japanese Government in its decision to support the U.K. request.

In similar vein, Hanemann, the German representative, expressed the hope that the U.K. would be able to maintain its OEEC liberalization and avoid the reimposition of Q.R.'s. Toussaint, the Belgian representative, also linked the desirability of massive Fund support to the U.K.'s intention to maintain the present degree of freedom of its trade and payments. Harcourt, in a subsequent reply to Hanemann, said it was the U.K.'s firm resolve not only to maintain its OEEC liberalization but "all other liberalization which it had achieved in the past five years".

In giving our support you said that we had been looking forward to the day when the Fund would place a large amount of its resources at the disposal of the U.K. for a convertibility operation. You added, however, that if it was not possible for the time being to make further progress, it was clearly of the utmost importance to retain the ground we had gained. Friis, the representative of the Scandinavian countries, expressed the same thought, as did the German. Each of them was also prepared to back the request. Friis expressed the hope that the U.K. would overcome its present difficulties in the not too distant future and that it would then be possible to move on to a world of still freer trade and payments. In concluding your remarks, you said we hoped the measures taken and to be taken by the Fund, the U.K. and others would "speedily achieve their purpose" and that it would not be too long "before we are again able to resume the substantial progress made over the past few years towards attainment of the Fund's objectives". Caranicas, speaking for Italy and Greece, regretted that the assistance to be given by the Fund would not be in support of sterling convertibility, but he thought that in a sense the Fund's action might prove to be just as useful (presumably in preventing a still worse situation). In any event, he believed that it was quite proper for the Fund to come to the assistance of a member in temporary difficulties of the kind being experienced by the U.K.

Only two speakers referred to the fundamental difficulties of the U.K. in the economic field and the need which might arise to take additional measures to achieve a healthy balance of payments situation in the longer run. And what was said was pretty circumspect. You mentioned that it was still too early to have a considered judgment of the full economic consequences on the U.K. of recent events or of the measures which might still be required to deal with them. In this connection, you noted that part of the Chancellor's statement which indicated that increases in taxation might well be called for and which stated that the wider implications of recent events on government expenditure and certain other fields would be given urgent attention. Hanemann touched briefly on these matters in saying that measures were being taken to reduce demand in the U.K. and that additional measures might be necessary. Lieftinck, the Dutch Director, who normally is pretty bearish on the U.K. economic outlook, on this occasion found it possible to agree that the basic position "could be called good". He recognized that the future international outlook was uncertain and might have difficult economic implications. He concluded, however, that one should not be pessimistic and with an expression of hope that the measures being taken would soon be successful. He was "very pleased to give full support" to the U.K.'s request.

In agreeing to the very large drawing and stand-by, you and several other Directors, including Southard (and for that matter Harcourt), drew attention to the unique features of sterling as an international currency and by implication at least indicated that what the Fund was prepared to do for the U.K. should not be regarded as a precedent for equally large accommodation to other member countries. Hanemann went a little further and emphasized that the Fund's policy would necessarily vary from case to case and that each case would have to be judged on its merit. While the question of precedent did not loom large in the discussion, I think the record will clearly show that the willingness of Directors to go along with 100% support for the U.K. was pretty well tied to the particular position of sterling and to the confidence movements accounting for so much of its present difficulty. Nonetheless, what was done by the Board cannot be disregarded in the history of the Fund's policy on the use of its resources. In this connection you will remember that Sol, who represents the Central American countries, said that the division of members' quotas into tranches had lost most of its significance "as the present case proved", and that the Fund's policy was now a liberal one both as regards large and small quotas. Moreover, Pinto said that in giving the U.K. support up to 100% of its quota the Fund was embarking on "a new phase of its own existence".

In the discussion, Lieftinck and Toussaint showed considerable interest in what Harcourt had said in his introductory statement about the currencies which might be purchased if a drawing became necessary under the Stand-by Agreement. Lieftinck enquired whether it was known what currencies might have to be drawn and expressed the hope that U.K. purchases of other members' currencies would not cause difficulties to members, who might at the time themselves be in a delicate payments situation as a result of international developments. Toussaint (Belgium) was more explicit. Speaking personally, he said he hoped and expected that a drawing would not become necessary under the stand-by. However, if the need arose and a decision was taken to draw in "other currencies" he took it that due consideration would be given to the situation in countries whose currencies might be drawn and he assumed that there would be full consultation on any such drawings. Harcourt, in reply to this discussion, re-emphasized that careful consideration would be given to currencies in which drawings might have to be made and went on to say that the U.K. "certainly would not intend to draw without ample consultation" with the country involved. Incidentally, you will recall that at this point in the discussion Southard intervened to say that the U.S. authorities were satisfied that on the occasion of the present drawing rule G-4 had been fully complied with. This is the rule which says that when a member expects to purchase an unusually large sum of any other member's currency, relative to the quota of that member, it shall give the Fund "as much notice of the proposed transaction or transactions as can reasonably be effected". Southard's intervention was in response to Lieftinck's expression of hope that the U.K.'s drawing, or possible future drawings under the Stand-by, would not cause difficulties to the members concerned. The implication of his comment would seem to be that in the U.S. view, notice to the Fund logically also involves notice to and consultation with the member whose currency is to be drawn.

Lieftinck asked, as a matter of information, whether an estimate could be given of the amount of overseas sterling holdings (Table 19 of SM/56/83) which might be regarded as demand liabilities. The reply was that the amount of sterling held by overseas countries as working balances could vary from time to time and that even sterling held by certain countries as a statutory currency reserve could also be varied by legislation. Accordingly, no precise answer could be given to the question and in the U.K. view an attempt to do so would not be profitable or meaningful.

As a special point in our statement, you assumed that the U.K. authorities would wish to keep the Fund fully and speedily informed of developments in the United Kingdom's economic situation and policies. You went on to suggest that the Fund, having committed so much of its resources, would have a duty to keep fully abreast of the U.K. position as it developed. No other speaker emphasized the desirability of the Fund keeping actively in touch with the U.K. (and vice versa) in the coming period. However, the new Director for the Argentine did suggest that in addition to giving the U.K. financial assistance it would be helpful if the Fund kept in close contact with it and with other countries adversely affected by recent developments in the Suez area.

After you and Southard had underlined the importance of the U.K.'s policy objectives as set out in paragraph 1, and after a minor change had been made in the text, the Stand-by Agreement was approved with no votes against and Mansour abstaining. He indicated that of his countries, Pakistan, the Philippines and the Lebanon supported the U.K. request; the other countries, Afghanistan, Ethiopia, Iran, Iraq, Jordan and Syria, in addition to Egypt, either wished him to abstain or had not been heard from.

I should perhaps mention the brief exchange which took place in the Board about the "waivers" in the U.S./U.K. and Canada/U.K. Financial Agreements.[8] Harcourt, in his opening statement, said he wished to refer to this matter in order to remove certain misunderstandings which might have arisen from press reports published after the Chancellor's statement in the House of Commons. Harcourt emphasized that it was quite incorrect to refer to the U.K. as having requested a waiver from the United States. The true position was that, provided certain conditions of the Agreement were fulfilled (which he outlined in brief), the U.K. had a positive right to the waiver. However, one of the conditions was incapable of intelligent interpretation. Accordingly, the Secretary of the Treasury had agreed to put the matter to Congress in order to resolve the difficulty. In describing the Canadian agreement, Harcourt indicated that a waiver on our part was mandatory provided the conditions of our Agreement were met and the conditions in the U.S. agreement were also fulfilled. In correcting this statement you said that under our Agreement the waiver would be granted if the conditions of Article 4(a) and (b) were met and if, in addition, interest payments due in a particular year on any credit made available to the Government of the U.K. to which a similar provision for a waiver of interest applied (the U.S. Agreement) were also waived. Harcourt correctly reported the comments of the Minister of Finance in paragraph 4 of his Press Release of December 4.

Memorandum by Deputy Governor of Bank of Canada

[Ottawa], May 31, 1957

MR. JACOBSSON'S COMMENTS ON THE CANADIAN PROPOSALS FOR THE ORGANIZATION OF THE WORK OF THE EXECUTIVE BOARD OF THE FUND

In his memorandum of May 8† Mr. Jacobsson expresses his views on the proposals for the organization of the work of the Executive Board of the Fund put forward by Mr. Harris at the Governors' meeting in September 1956. He reaches the conclusion that "there can be no general adoption of the Canadian proposals" and suggests as a possible alternative approach towards improving the functioning of the Fund (a) that the Fund should pay the expenses of Executive Directors and their families for home leave in one of the countries the Director represents every year or every other year, and (b) that the Fund should arrange each February meetings of senior Treasury and Central Bank officials from a limited number of countries to discuss informally the world payments and economic situation, allow personal contacts, etc. There is also a suggestion in the Managing Director's paper that the salaries presently paid to the Executive Directors ($17,000 per annum net of taxation) may be too low to attract men of the calibre required under the present system of organization.

See Volume 22, Chapter IV, Part 3, Section C, Sub-section II.

In any matter relating to the organization and working methods of the Fund it is obvious that the views of the Managing Director must be treated with great consideration, and the organizational arrangements of the Fund must clearly be of a character which carries his judgment. However, Mr. Jacobsson has stressed in his memorandum the tentative nature of his own suggestions, and in view of this and of the apparent failure of the Canadian representatives to make clear what they had in mind in their proposals, it may be helpful to put forward some comments on various points raised by the Managing Director.

In practical terms, the Canadian proposal boils down to a suggestion that the Executive Board of the Fund should schedule meetings a few times a year for the discussion of important policy matters in order to make it possible for those countries who wish to do so to be represented on the Board of Directors who would continue to have operating responsibilities in their own countries. This suggestion is a modest one. It involves nothing more than an informal agreement by the Board that it will try to schedule its business in a certain way. It requires no country to change its present method of representation on the Board. The Canadian Executive Director has discussed the proposal with several Directors and has encountered much support and no opposition.

The Managing Director's objections to the Canadian proposal appear to be

(a) that it is difficult or impossible to apply the suggestion to Directors who represent more than one country,

(b) that it is difficult or impossible to distinguish between important and unimportant matters,

(c) that the influence of the Managing Director would be reduced if there were fewer full time Executive Directors,

(d) that full time Directors are needed to provide a background of knowledge of the Fund essential to the effectiveness of the Board.

As regards the first of these objections, we have recognized that, even if our proposal were adopted certain countries would wish to continue to be represented by full time Directors, and as indicated above it would be left open to each Director to operate as he saw fit. To accomplish the purposes we have in mind it is not necessary that all Directors become "part-time". Our aim is to help make the Fund a more vital and influential institution, and it would contribute to this result even if only the main trading countries of the world were represented by officials with national operating responsibilities. It is true that practical considerations make it easier to apply the "part-time" system to Directors who represent only one country, but it is not accurate to say that the system is impossible to apply in the case of Directors representing several countries. Mr. Saad, representing 10 countries, operates on that basis; for several years the Canadian Director operated on that basis, representing Iceland and later Norway; and the German Director operated on that basis, representing Yugoslavia. The "other" country or countries represented by a part-time Director may well wish him to be present on those infrequent occasions when a matter of particular importance to it, e.g. a drawing, or a change in its exchange rate, is up for discussion. Even in these cases, however, it would probably make for more realistic and knowledgeable discussion in the Board if the "other" country were represented directly by one of its own officials as it is entitled to be under the Articles of Agreement. This procedure has been followed on several occasions (frequently with the full-time Executive Director present) with satisfactory results.

Mr. Jacobsson apparently regards the fact that Directors are elected, as he says, "very much in a personal capacity" as a serious objection to their not being full-time at the headquarters of the Fund. The implication would appear to be that the countries electing them would not be satisfied to be represented during the greater part of the year by someone else, i.e. the Alternate. Now, it is true in a formal sense that when the Executive Directors are elected voting takes place for an individual, but essentially the process is one of (1) arranging voting blocs to secure the necessary number of votes and (2) voting for the candidate put forward by the largest country in each group, with some saw-off between directorships and alternateships and between representation on the Board of the Fund and on the Board of the Bank. Since no group of countries would be required under the Canadian proposal to be represented by a Director with national operating responsibilities, any group which decided to be so represented would presumably have come to the conclusion (already reached in certain cases) that their interests, including their over-all interest in the functioning of the Fund would be best served by the combination of the particular part-time Executive Director whose services would be available under his arrangement and the full-time Alternate.

The second objection raised by the Managing Director to the Canadian proposals is the difficulty in distinguishing between important and unimportant questions. This would not seem to be a difficulty that he is likely to continue to experience for very long. There have, as he points out, been an unusually large number of exchange transactions during the past five months but, with the exception of the U.K. drawing, they did not involve the adoption of any basically new policies by the Fund, though no doubt a good deal of pains-taking preparatory work on the part of the new Managing Director was needed. Indeed, his task in satisfying himself that the proposed drawings were proper ones for the Fund would undoubtedly have been easier if the drawing country had been represented by an Executive Director who had just come from home to negotiate the loan and who would be returning home to some job of responsibility. It would certainly be expected that "part-time" Executive Directors would go to the headquarters of the Fund to discuss a proposed drawing by their country. On the other hand, under the present arrangements, the Fund is in the unique position of lending large sums of money without it being necessary for the borrowing country to send a Treasury or central bank official to negotiate the loan, explain the country's policies and prospects, etc. Since last October the Fund has arranged credits or permitted drawings in amounts of $1,300 million (U.K.), $262 million (France), $200 million (India), $75 million (Argentina) and $50 million (Belgium) without a single one of these cases establishing direct contact with the national authorities who will be responsible for the expenditure of the funds or for the policies which will determine whether repayment can be made.

The third objection raised by the Managing Director to our proposals is that his influence depends to a large extent on the "quality and authority of the Executive Directors". If this means that the Managing Director should exercise his influence mainly through a Board of full-time Directors resident in Washington, the view is one with which we are unable to agree. On the other hand, we would readily agree that the Managing Director's influence in national policies would be enhanced if the Executive Directors were, to a greater extent than now, persons who had some share in the formulation and execution of these policies — this indeed is one of the main objects of our proposals.

There seems to be some risk that underlying this last point raised by Mr. Jacobsson is an inward-looking conception of the role of the Fund, reflected in what we would regard as an excessive preoccupation with the question of how smoothly the machinery turns over at 1818 H Street. The conception of the Fund which we have held is of an institution which is intended to radiate influence throughout the world. We believe that it would help accomplish this if the important trading countries were represented on the Board by operating officials rather than "international civil servants" and that the proposal we have made would enhance the authority of the Managing Director and make it more possible for him to establish direct relations with the responsible national monetary authorities.

The final specific objection made by the Managing Director to the Canadian proposals — that full time Directors provide a necessary background of knowledge for the work of the Board — can be dealt with briefly. It is of course important that the Board should have a thorough knowledge of the Fund and its methods. However it is not necessary to live in Washington to acquire this knowledge, nor should it be forgotten that the Fund has a permanent staff of 400 (apart from 17 Directors, 17 Alternates and 33 Assistants to Directors and Alternates) whose knowledge and experience are available to the Board.

Turning now from Mr. Jacobsson's specific objections to our proposals to his own suggestions, it is unlikely that the proposal to increase the benefits (and possibly the remuneration) of the Executive Directors will commend itself here. The Directors can now go to the countries appointing or electing them on business travel as frequently as they choose, and the current budget provides an item of $60,000 for such business travel of Executive Directors, apart from a similar amount for appointment and repatriation travel and $11,000 for home leave travel. Executive Directors have the same home leave privileges as senior members of the staff, and it is difficult to see what justification there is for the Fund to incur additional expenses to pay the fares of Directors' families home for annual holidays on the ground that this will increase the effectiveness of the Fund. If there is a case for greater benefits of this sort it should be made on its own merits.

The Managing Director's proposal to arrange an annual meeting at which senior officials from the Treasuries and central banks of 20 countries would be invited to take part in a three day session of informal discussions of the world payments situation is an interesting one. If other more distant countries feel that such a meeting is likely to be purposeful, and arrange for their Deputy Ministers of Finance and central bank Governors to attend, it is altogether likely that Canada will be willing to do likewise. However, such a meeting seems hardly likely to accomplish the main purposes we have had in mind in putting forward our proposals regarding the Executive Board. This meeting would presumably be attended by in the neighbourhood of 75 people (including Fund staff). The discussions would have to be general in character as they would not be focused on concrete Fund problems, which would necessarily be left to the Executive Board. Having in mind the general character of the discussions, the size of the gathering and the lack of real continuity in meetings held at yearly intervals, there is a real risk that the predominant atmosphere of the meetings would be academic and that the predominant atmosphere of the whole gathering would be social. If this turned out to be the case, the attendance of the senior officials whose presence was desired would of course fall off in subsequent years.

In spite of this uncertainty of success, the idea may well be worth a trial.

While we are appreciative of the consideration the Managing Director has given our proposals, it is apparent from these notes that we do not believe that very convincing reasons have been brought forward why the scheduling of policy meetings of the Executive Directors should not be undertaken, nor that an adequate substitute has been suggested. In his memorandum the Managing Director remarks that "there may be a number of countries who are sufficiently interested in the Canadian proposal to give it a trial". However, most countries would not find it possible to give it a trial unless the Board changed its work methods in the way indicated, i.e. by scheduling policy meetings at stated intervals, for only then would they contemplate nominating operating officials as Executive Directors. The change in work methods suggested is in fact a relatively minor one which involves no basic change in the present arrangements. We intend therefore to continue to try to persuade the Managing Director that the idea is worth a trial.

ACCORD INTERNATIONAL SUR LE BLÉ
INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

6. International Wheat Agreement

Mr. Sharp began by explaining that we were not at all optimistic about the outcome of the Geneva discussions which resume on February 20. Canada was prepared to renew the agreement if the terms were reasonable, but we had no great expectation that reasonable terms would be forthcoming. These were the desiderata:

(a) The Agreement must apply to a sufficiently large proportion of the world's trade in wheat. If the exporters who join were the same as in the present Agreement the minimum quantity we would consider reasonable would be about 600,000 bushels (roughly the same as in the first Agreement). If the Argentine joined the total minimum quantity should be 700,000 to 750,000 bushels. We hoped to find out early in the discussions whether these figures might be feasible.

(b) We would be satisfied to have the same exporters as now, although we would be happy to have the Argentine as well. We were indifferent to French participation, and had no views yet about the U.S.S.R.

(c) It was very desirable that the U.K. should rejoin; we were doubtful about the value of an agreement without the U.K. But we would not go to undue lengths to get the U.K. to join.

(d) We would be prepared to make concessions about the ceiling, more so if the Agreement was a short one (3 years). We would be very firm about retaining the present minimum price. We would give no indication of any willingness to make any concession on the floor; this for two reasons:

(i) We do not think the present floor is at all higher than is reasonable, and we believe other countries including importers would take the same view on behalf of their own producers; and

(ii) we think any agreement to a lower floor price would be interpreted as a belief that prices were going lower, which would have an immediate effect on the market.

Mr. Sharp said he had discussed with U.K. officials their contention that there should be flexibility within the range between the maximum and minimum prices. He was not opposed to this principle provided it was not taken to mean that in present circumstances we should go to the floor. The decision whether to make a call at the floor was entirely ours to make.

The U.S. officials reported that there was a belief in the U.S. that the conclusion of an Agreement would be impossible unless the floor was lowered. They also said there would be some desire in the U.S. to accept a lower minimum, because of the present large stocks. (They mentioned $1.40 as a possibility). They wanted to have the Canadian view before further consideration was given to this in Washington. They thought it might be hard to defend the same floor price that had seemed reasonable three years ago.

Mr. McNamara replied that a good case could be made for retaining $1.55 on these grounds:

(i) Importers were buying wheat at higher prices than $1.55 and not complaining; nor were they getting comparable wheat below that price from other countries such as the Argentine; and

(ii) The cost of production had certainly not fallen during these three years.

Finally, Mr. McNamara emphasized that we regard the minimum as something to resort to only if the movement of wheat in international trade is abnormally small.

Procès-verbal d'une réunion avec les fonctionnaires des États-Unis et Australie sur l'accord international sur le blé

Minutes of Meeting with United States and Australian Officials to discuss International Wheat Agreement

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, January 20, [1956]

Mr. McLain opened the discussion by explaining that opinion in the United States was divided on the desirability of a lower minimum. With the present surplus there was a case for lower prices, yet it had proved possible for the exporting countries to hold the line fairly well, and costs of production had risen if anything. If Canada and Australia were very anxious not to see a significantly lower price, and would not want an agreement on such terms the United States would like to know.

Sir Edwin McCarthy replied that Australia would not accept a lower price unless the quantities were substantial (e.g., unless the U.K. joined with its earlier quota). He indicated that in such case Australia would not be willing to go down more than ten cents. He said that as long as the U.K. was paying its own farmers 16/- (about $2.25) Australians would not see any reason why their own price should be much below the present minimum.

When asked whether Australia would be willing to make a call at the new minimum he replied that it would if necessary; but he did not think it would be necessary. Australia would, however, be willing to bring its prices down to the new minimum (if it was lower) if this was necessary to do business. He thought the U.K. expected that the price would come down to the new minimum under a new agreement. The U.K. would not consider it within the spirit of the agreement for the exporters to keep the price above the minimum in present circumstances. They would probably seek a commitment on this. He personally thought they had a case.

McLain commented that he thought the U.S. would not give any such commitment; if they did, no wheat would be sold until they went to the new minimum.

McCarthy thought the U.K. traders did not care much what the price was as long as it was stable. This was why they favoured an agreement. He went on to say that he agreed that a lower price would not really move more wheat as a whole; however, Australia would sell more at the expense of France and the Argentine.

Mr. McNamara reported that there was a division of opinion in Canada as to whether the IWA had outlived its usefulness. There would be support for an agreement only if the terms were realistic. It must control about two-thirds of the total world trade in wheat. We would not be prepared to consider a lower minimum price than $1.55. This had been accepted by the importers in the last negotiations without much debate, in the light of production costs and other factors. We recognized that it would not be possible to keep the present maximum price. We would accept a lower figure; how low might depend on the term of the agreement. In a short agreement (3 years) we might go as far as $1.90, but not in a longer agreement.

Mr. Sharp added that when he had talked with Sir Frank Lee and Sir Alan Hitchman in December they had stressed the importance they attached to the principles they had put forward at Geneva, especially price flexibility. He had replied that if this meant we should go to the floor in present circumstances we could not accept such an interpretation. We would contract to deliver at the maximum in exchange for the right to make a call at the minimum but the decision as to what price to charge in between, or when to make a call, would be our concern.

He had also pointed out that $1.55 at Fort William was not a remunerative price generally, although it might be if farmers could keep getting yields of 20 bushels an acre and could sell all they produced.

Mr. Sharp added that the nature of the so-called "deal" between Canada and the U.S. was that both countries had decided to keep some stocks off the market. But if we went to the minimum we would not really sell any more wheat, and we would still have to decide whether to hold stocks. The logic of the U.K. position was that when the IWA price was at the minimum, the non-IWA price should be below it; i.e., there should be competition until the market collapsed.

McCarthy replied that this was why the question of quantities was so important: if enough wheat was covered by the Agreement the non-Agreement market would be unimportant.

Mr. McLain was inclined to agree with Sir Edwin that the U.K. were right in supposing that it was originally contemplated that in a situation such as the present the price would move to the minimum. He agreed that the importers were likely to insist on a statement on this point by the exporters.

Mr. Sharp suggested that it could be argued that, if the U.K. view were accepted, when the situation improved the price should immediately swing to the maximum. Indeed the U.K. had argued strongly in the last negotiations that prices would never be in between the maximum and the minimum but would swing right from one to the other.

Mr. McNamara stressed the importance of avoiding any discussion of lower price levels which might lead buyers to hold back. The Agreement after all was of limited value.

Sir Edwin McCarthy replied that the Agreement was rather more important for Australia. If, however, Canada and the U.S. were convinced they could hold the line on the present basis the Canadian attitude was justified. In any case Australia would not "do anything foolish" at Geneva.

Mr. Hughes indicated that the U.S. (like Australia) would probably be ready to make some concession on the minimum price.

There was some brief discussion on the term of the Agreement (Canada and the U.S. preferred 3 years, Australia 5 years), exporters' quotas, arbitration, and quality differentials. It was agreed that a few representatives of each of the three delegations, without farm advisers, should meet in Australia House, London, on February 17, the Friday before the resumption of the Geneva meetings. There should be no publicity about this meeting.

Le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au haut-commissaire au Royaume-Uni

Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner in United Kingdom

TELEGRAM 128 Ottawa, January 25, 1956

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following for N.A. Robertson from C.D. Howe, Begins: We have been informed by the United Kingdom High Commissioner's Office here that the United Kingdom Government might be in a position to talk with us about the International Wheat Agreement between February third and February seventh. This indication is in response to a suggestion from Mitchell Sharp to Sir Allen Hitchman, at the time of the United Kingdom-Canada Continuing Committee meetings, that it was desirable to have preliminary talks between our two countries before the reopening of international negotiations in Geneva on February twentieth. We are informing the High Commissioner's Office here that you will act on behalf of Canada at these preliminary talks.

2. We are most interested to know whether the United Kingdom government is strongly in favour of a renewal of the International Wheat Agreement or whether they are willing to join only if the terms are very much in their favour. During the conversations in Ottawa, Hitchman and Lee indicated that there was strong opposition to the United Kingdom's reentry into the Agreement and that the government had to demonstrate that it had gained major concessions in order to justify to the public a reversal of policy.

3. You may inform the United Kingdom representatives at the meeting that Canada's participation in the new Agreement will depend in the main upon the level of guaranteed quantities and of prices. We do not think that there would be much value in an agreement which did not cover about two-thirds of international trade in wheat, that is about six hundred million bushels out of nine hundred million bushels, assuming membership of the United States, Canada, Australia and France as exporters and proportionately more if Argentina were a member. As for prices, Canada is not prepared to agree to a reduction in the minimum price below the present level of $1.55 for number one Northern, in store Fort William. Provided the Agreement is for a period of not longer than three years, we could agree to a significant reduction in the ceiling price (for your own information to as low as $1.90), but if the Agreement were for a longer period we would have to be correspondingly firmer at the top.

4. I wish the United Kingdom Government to be fully informed about the firmness of the Canadian view on these two points, so that if our respective views are irreconcilable, each of us will know this in advance and will avoid public bickering at Geneva which can only serve to harm Canadian-United Kingdom relations and relations between the Canadian Wheat Board and the United Kingdom, its best customer. In the view of the Canadian Government, $1.55 is a reasonable and justifiable floor. Farm costs are much the same as three years ago. This price is very much lower than the support prices of all importing and exporting countries except Canada and Australia. Given normal yields $1.55 is by no means a remunerative price to Canadian growers, particularly after deduction of storage and interest costs on normal commercial stocks held by the Canadian Wheat Board. For your own information, I believe that a reduction in this minimum price would have a weakening effect on the price structure in general.

5. Hitchman and Lee indicated to Sharp that they believed that under existing circumstances our prices should be at the minimum under the Agreement. We do not accept this position. Our sales have been reasonably satisfactory at existing prices and we see no reason to call upon the importers to take up their guaranteed quantities at the floor. The Canadian position is that Canada would honour her obligation at the ceiling, as she has done in the past, but that the question of putting the price to the minimum and calling upon the importers to fulfill their obligations lies solely within the discretion of each individual exporter. Any modification of this principle would be quite unacceptable to Canada.

6. Lawrie is being fully informed of the discussions which have taken place between the Canadian delegates and their farm advisers and between the Canadian, United States and Australian delegates during the past few days. I suggest that Lawrie might accompany you to the meetings with the United Kingdom representatives. Ends.

Following for Right Honourable C.D. Howe from Robertson, Begins: Lawrie and I saw Hitchman with three or four senior colleagues at the Ministry of Agriculture and Food this afternoon. As Hitchman was prepared to outline the position which the U.K. advisers were putting up to their ministers, we listened.

2. Hitchman said that the U.K. were concerned about the world wheat situation and interested in ensuring that the present surplus position be adjusted without serious impact upon the world's economy. The main elements of the problem as the U.K. saw it followed pretty closely the first four points of the five-point exposition of the U.K. point of view made by Bishop in his speech in Geneva on October 27th (see Document E/Conf.20/EX/SR.2, page II); i.e., the U.K. would be prepared to take part in a concerted international effort to bring about the orderly disposal of world wheat surpluses. As part of an Agreement directed to this object, they would be prepared to relate their own production policies and incentives to growers to an agreed international programme. They would if necessary be prepared to restore such measures of control as might be required to implement their undertakings under such a programme. They did not think the present Wheat Agreement had any relevance to the problem of disposal of surpluses, and they did not think it would be politically feasible for the U.K. to reverse the position it had taken with respect to the IWA unless it could be demonstrated that a new Agreement was seriously intended to attack the problem of surpluses which had become much more important the last two years than it was when the present Agreement was negotiated. Rightly or wrongly, public opinion in this country had approved of the U.K. Government's withdrawal from the Agreement and expected no particular advantage to accrue from the U.K. returning to a substantially similar Agreement.

3. After listening to this outline of U.K. thinking, in which Hitchman had not thought it necessary to define the U.K. position in respect of any specific aspects of the present Agreement, I decided, I hope correctly, that it would be unwise and unrealistic at this stage to reveal any of the specific points in the Canadian position which you had authorized me to communicate to Hitchman and his colleagues. I said that as far as I knew, thinking in Ottawa had been proceeding on much more modest and limited lines, that we had been considering the pros and cons of continuing an International Wheat Agreement of much the same shape and structure as that now in being — particularly as the preliminary discussions in Geneva had not produced any suggestions for its radical revision. In making up our own minds we naturally wished to know how much importance the U.K. attached to such an agreement. In general we felt that international wheat prices were not high in relation to other commodity prices, and that the quantity of wheat moving into human consumption was not likely to be proportionately increased by downward price adjustments. They did not dispute this very vigorously but thought that there was a good deal more elasticity in the demand for wheat for feed.

4. Hitchman said that they had seen McCarthy of Australia this morning, and had given him a similar explanation of the U.K. approach to the problem. They would very much like to learn how Canada viewed it before their ministers here settled their delegation's instructions from Geneva. He hoped we would be in a position to meet them again early next week. In the meantime they were not proposing to consult any other government, although it was possible that after they heard from Canada and Australia, they might put their ideas up to the U.S. and possibly India before the Geneva Conference resumed.[9]

TELEGRAM 193 Ottawa, February 6, 1956

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Following for N.A. Robertson from C.D. Howe, Begins: Your report of the United Kingdom approach to a new International Wheat Agreement did not occasion surprise. We had formed the very strong opinion that the United Kingdom did not intend to rejoin the present Agreement, almost regardless of price levels, and would seek some means of withdrawing from the present Geneva negotiations while still appearing to support the principle of an International Agreement.

[9] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Mr. Ritchie & file: Mitchell [Sharp] and [George] Vogel have seen this. They regard this as a clever UK way of presenting a refusal to participate, knowing full well that none of the importers at Geneva was willing to discuss domestic politics. J.F. G[randy]

2. It is unfortunate that the United Kingdom's attitude had not been made clear to the Geneva Conference at its First Session, thereby avoiding futile discussion of amendments to an agreement which they were not prepare to support. Earlier indication of this attitude would have enabled the conference to devote its energies to seeking an alternative.

3. While it is true that the present form of multilateral Agreement is not a solution to the problem of surpluses, and no one has suggested that it is, it can nevertheless be a useful means of insulating prices and markets from the effects of surpluses to the extent that the members wish to avail themselves of the protection at the floor. It can equally well be said that it did not solve the problem of shortages but it proved to be a valuable protection to importing countries in the years of shortage following 1949.

4. Canada would have no objection whatever to a supplementary Agreement dealing with the problem of existing surpluses. We would welcome, for example, the withdrawal of artificial supports and protection to wheat growing in all countries. We believe that if wheat prices in all countries were at the level of present Canadian prices, to both producers and consumers, there would be few problems of a continuing nature.

5. We would also welcome adherence by exporting countries to a policy of restraint in disposal of existing wheat surpluses, pending their disappearance either as a result of the withdrawal of increased acreages resulting from artificial stimuli or the recurrence of crop failures in some areas of the trading world.

6. We are sceptical, however, as to the prospects of achieving the necessary degree of international cooperation towards either of these desirable objectives. We continue to believe that the present form of Agreement, if broadly supported, can contribute something to stability and we shall strongly support its renewal along the lines indicated in my previous message which you should now convey to Hitchman. We would welcome a supplementary agreement relating to surpluses if one can be achieved. We cannot take seriously a proposal to abandon the present agreement in favour of some disembodied and non-existent alternative.

7. However, we have no desire to quarrel publicly with the United Kingdom Government on this issue. We are more interested in retaining the United Kingdom as a good customer for our wheat and flour.

8. Presumably, the United Kingdom Delegation will declare itself shortly after the conference resumes on February 20th. We would hope that the declaration in favour of an alternative approach will be accompanied by some specific proposals to be examined briefly by the full conference and then submitted for further study to a committee.

9. If, on the other hand, the United Kingdom Delegation is not going to make a specific proposals [sic] will be forthcoming from any other delegation. In that case, a decision will be necessary as to whether the negotiations should be broken off quickly or whether weeks should be spent in futile debate on what will inevitably be a lost cause. The United Kingdom tactics will be very important in this connection. It will be most helpful if you are able to ascertain the position which the United Kingdom will take on the opening of the conference.

10. We are wondering also whether Frank Anderson knows of the likely United Kingdom position. If he does it would be useful to have his opinion as to the way in which the conference will proceed.

11. Please suggest to Hitchman that the United States, with whom we are to meet in London about February 17th, should be informed of the United Kingdom position. Ends.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

For M.W. Sharp Associate Deputy Minister Department of Trade and Commerce, Begins: I talked this morning with Marvin McLain. He confirmed what Earl Hughes had told me with reference to the instructions to the IWA Delegation to the Geneva meetings, which was reported to you in my teletype under reference. He said there has been substantial agreement among government officials and their advisors that the present range in prices should not be changed in a new Agreement. The producer representatives in particular do not want a reduction in the minimum.

2. Every effort, he said, will be made by the US Delegation in conjunction with Canada to hold the present price range. However, should it become clearly evident that no agreement is possible without a lower minimum, he thought the US would be prepared to accept a reduction of five, ten or even possibly fifteen cents in the minimum price, but reductions of this order would only be accepted in order to save the Agreement. Full consultation with the Canadians would precede the acceptance by the US of any change in the price range.

3. "It is our opinion", he said, "that the Canadians are right in wanting to maintain the present minimum. Canada has more reason for this stand", he said, "than has the US."

4. He is most anxious, he said, to know how firmly Canada will resist probable pressures from the importers to reduce the minimum, even to obtain a renewal of the Agreement. Canada's policy in this regard will be a major factor in determining the attitude of the US, he continued. He hoped, he said, that this matter will be made clear at the London meeting.

5. Only US government officials will go to London.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

Following for the Right Honourable C.D. Howe from Robertson, Begins: Lawrie and I saw Hitchman and his colleagues again on Wednesday, February 8, and spoke to them in the sense of your telegrams 193 and 128. They took note of the Canadian point of view, which they promised to communicate to their ministers. The discussion was desultory, with recrimination just below the surface on both sides. They are expecting to see Sharp and McNamara when they arrive on February 16, but did not anticipate that there could be any Cabinet reconsideration of the United Kingdom position between now and then. Yesterday morning the United Kingdom group saw McCarthy, whose comments on their approach and proposals were very similar to ours.

2. At our meeting on Wednesday I had raised the question of the United Kingdom informing Anderson, as President of the Conference, of the position they were taking. Yesterday afternoon Anderson met the United Kingdom group less Hitchman and was told of the conclusions they had reached. I gather that he dissented very vigorously, and followed up his observations this morning with a letter to Harwood, the text of which is repeated in my immediately following telegram.†

3. As you know, the Canadians in London have carefully kept out of any discussion of United Kingdom policy toward the IWA over the last two years. I thought myself this was the right policy, but it may have been a mistake. I fear our reticence may have confirmed their complacency that everything was working out for the best, particularly as I have never met anything to suggest that United Kingdom representatives in Canada have ever attempted to warn their government of the general Canadian feeling on this subject.

4. I have asked Heathcoat Amory and Home to have dinner with me alone this evening. Neither of them has had anything to do with past relations with the Wheat Agreement, but now they are probably the two ministers most directly concerned. I shall let you know if they confirm the line taken by their officials in their conversations with the Australians and ourselves ends.

TELEGRAM 159 London, February 16, 1956

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Mitchell Sharpe from McNamara, Begins: Accompanied by the High Commissioner, Wilson, Davidson and I met George Bishop, who will again head the U.K. Delegation. Curzon of C.R.O. also attended.

2. Bishop stated that the U.K. will not support or take part in the negotiation of a New Wheat Agreement patterned on the present Agreement. He did not give reasons for decision of ministers, but indicated serious thought on their part in reaching foregoing conclusion. From his remarks we gathered impression that while the U.K. will not negotiate a renewed Agreement they will take position that an Agreement similar to the current agreement could again operate without U.K. participation.

3. Bishop stated that the U.K. will suggest that the International Wheat Council be empowered to discuss basic wheat problems and for such discussions to include countries which are not signatory to a new Wheat Agreement if one is negotiated. He amplified this thought in discussion by stating that the Wheat Council could exercise dual function of administering a renewed Wheat Agreement if one is arrived at, and in addition direct its attention to surplus problems. He indicated that the U.K. would indicate some basic problems for consideration and in discussion indicated that production incentives in importing countries would come within his proposal. Bishop also stated that although the U.K. will not take part in discussions for a renewal of the present Agreement, they will stand by for discussions of other proposals. This eliminates U.K. from price and quantity discussions if the conference gets to that stage.

4. In reply to a question by the High Commissioner, Bishop stated that the United States was being advised of the British position this afternoon, as well as other Commonwealth countries not already advised.

5. Bishop further stated that the U.K. position would be presented to the Wheat Conference in an official statement on Monday next at the plenary session. In discussion he indicated that the responsible ministers thought that no time should be lost in revealing the U.K. position.

6. A difficult position now confronts our delegation. Our feeling is that following the U.K. statement we should make a short statement to the effect that as a result of discussions at first session Canada had decided to support the renewal of the current Agreement provided it contained guaranteed quantities sufficiently large to enable it to accomplish its objectives. However, in view of the decision of the U.K., the world's largest importer, not to participate in renewal, it appears to us that the conference is now confronted with two major problems. These are:

(a) to explore the feasibility of re-negotiating an Agreement without U.K. participation;

(b) to study carefully and examine the U.K. proposals.

Delegations will require time to reassess the Wheat Agreement position and to study the U.K. proposals. Having said this, we should then suggest an adjournment of the conference in order that delegations might secure new instructions. In order to facilitate consideration by other governments, we would invite the U.K. delegation to amplify its new proposals in as much detail as possible prior to the adjournment.

7. Our delegation will await your instructions.[10]

UNITED NATIONS WHEAT CONFERENCE

The Second Session of the United Nations Wheat Conference which began in Geneva on February 20 is still in progress. It is not yet clear whether or not these discussions will lead to a new International Wheat Agreement to replace the present agreement which expires on July 31. The United Kingdom delegate announced that the United Kingdom would not be willing to enter an agreement along the lines of the present one. He made these criticisms of the present kind of wheat agreement:

(a) the disposal of surpluses was not linked to the working of the agreement;

(b) it did nothing to discourage the continuance of production in excess of effective demand;

(c) it did nothing to encourage increased consumption; and

(d) it contained no effective provisions to ensure the free movement of prices within the range prescribed in the agreement.

The United Kingdom delegate believed that measures of a different character could be found and said the United Kingdom would give full support to any discussions aiming to establish by formal convention a set of internationally agreed rules for the orderly disposal of wheat surpluses.

The principal exporters expressed some disappointment at the United Kingdom decision which they said made it somewhat doubtful whether a large enough proportion of world trade in wheat could be brought into a new agreement to make it effective. They were, however, willing to continue the negotiations without the United Kingdom participating. The importers also agreed to continue to negotiate on this basis. So far, however, it is by no means certain that enough wheat will be involved to make an Agreement realistic.

Following for Right Honourable C.D. Howe repeated Vogel from Sharp, Begins: At Sub-Committee meeting this morning (Monday) importers made firm proposal of $1.90 maximum and $1.45 minimum for Agreement presumably 3 or 4 years although duration not too definite. We reiterated the Canadian position that guaranteed quantities for Canada are too small to justify price concession of any kind. It is possible that importers will finally be prepared to raise their offer by 5 cents per bushel. We have given no indication whatever that such an offer would be accepted. In fact we have made it as definite as language will permit, that in view of small quantities Canada cannot consider price concession. We assume, however, that before rejecting such an offer the government would wish to have individual views of farm advisers. Marler is only adviser who has so far indicated willingness to consider price concession at the minimum.

2. We have repeatedly thrown out the hint that a short term arrangement for one or two years at existing price would be acceptable to Canada. This short term idea is supported by a number of importers as a final alternative to breakdown but has not yet been thoroughly discussed by the importers as a group.

TELEGRAM 28 Ottawa, March 20, 1956

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for High Commissioner from C.D. Howe, repeat to M.W. Sharp, Hotel de la Paix, Geneva, Begins: Will you please deliver following message immediately to Mr. McEwen:

1. Thank you for your message[11] received through Copland. I appreciate the frankness and thoroughness with which you have reviewed the Australian position.

2. I must be equally frank and tell you that, from the Canadian point of view, it would not be worthwhile to agree to reduced prices in order to get an agreement with the limited quantities indicated. Because the International Wheat Agreement has been a worthwhile example of international co-operation, I could defend a renewal of the Agreement with present maximum and minimum prices, even with reduced quantities. I would find it difficult, however, to contend that such a renewal warranted a reduction in those prices.

3. I can appreciate that Australia, already selling at or near the minimum, may look at the matter differently. Canada, however, is not at or near the minimum and, under the present circumstances, I can assure you that we do not intend to test the minimum. If we were to agree now to reduced maximums and minimums in a new agreement, this would inevitably be regarded by the importers as a sign of weakness. It could result in a renewal of the type of atmosphere where buyers hold back in anticipation of a price-break and which, in itself, creates a downward pressure on prices. If that were to happen to Canadian prices, it would of course have an immediate effect on your own.

4. If the I.W.A. negotiations do collapse, I can assure you that Canada will be ready and anxious to continue close and frequent discussions amongst the exporters. At the November meeting of the Wheat Conference, the United Kingdom Representative expressed the opinion that prices had been stabilized not because of the presence of the agreement but because the surplus stocks were in strong hands. I think we must agree that there was some justification for this opinion and, if the present Agreement is not renewed, I could hope that the major exporters will continue to pursue policies of firm and stable pricing.

5. Under the circumstances, therefore, I am reluctant to join you in an approach to the United Kingdom nor could I honestly encourage a postponement to permit discussion at the Prime Ministers' conference. I would, however, agree to a one-year extension of the present Agreement with the present prices to permit a thorough examination of the United Kingdom's type of proposal of which we have few details. It seems to me it is too important to be considered hurriedly at the present time.

6. Copland has copy of this reply. Ends.

McCarthy of Australia has approached seven principal importers to determine whether they could accept a three year agreement minimum of $1.50 maximum $1.95. South Africa, Germany, Belgium, Netherlands, Ireland and Brazil have answered in affirmative. India has not yet been approached. Japanese delegate says his instructions do not permit him to accept, but for reasons given yesterday true attitude of Japan is uncertain.

2. Tomorrow, Thursday, Sub-Committee on Prices and Duration will meet to consider importers offer of $1.45 minimum $1.90 maximum. Importers will re-state receiving offer. Canadian Delegation will say our position remains as previously stated namely that notwithstanding inadequate quantities we are willing to renew for three years or shorter period on present price basis. According to McCarthy, Anderson would then ask whether any compromise between these price views is possible. We would agree to report to Ottawa without holding out hope of acceptance.

3. We shall report on actual events tomorrow. Meanwhile we are canvassing views of farm advisers.

4. One year extension on present price basis does not now appear to command sufficient support from importers.

5. Sharp is planning to go to Bonn for meeting Friday or Saturday followed by one day in London before return to Ottawa. He will keep in touch with Geneva by telephone. Ends.

Following for C.D. Howe from M.W. Sharp, Begins: Repeat to Vogel.

Conference developed as forecast in yesterday's message. Subcommittees were unable to agree on prices. Chairman reported this fact to Committee on Quantities and Prices. Chairman then went on to say that in order to break apparent deadlock he took responsibility for proposing compromise solution of minimum $1.50 maximum $1.95. We had been informed of this possibility in advance and had requested that compromise price at ceiling be left open between $1.95 and $2.00 price. He said that he was unwilling to do so and that if blocked or any other exporter wished to make proposal of $1.50 minimum $2.00 maximum it was free to do so.

2. When Chairman made his compromise proposal we repeated our position at length roughly along the lines of statement[12] sent to Vogel. Commenting on Anderson's compromise we said that we would transmit it to our government but could not hold out hope of acceptance. We drew particular attention to drop of ten cents in ceiling in return for very little, if any stability at floor because of inadequate quantities. Van Essche, Chairman of importers, on the other hand said that minimum of $1.50 would be more acceptable to importers if exporters could agree to $1.90 at ceiling.

3. All importers and exporters are now seeking new instructions.

4. Anticipating that we would be confronted by a proposal for compromise between the position of the exporting countries at $1.55-$2.05 and that of importing countries at $1.45-$1.90 I polled the farm advisers on three questions: one, would they support government if it were to enter into an agreement basis of $1.55-$2.05 for not more than three years. Their replies were unanimous in the affirmative. Secondly, would they support government if it were to break off negotiations rather than to accept any reduction from present price range. Without implying recommendations they reaffirmed unanimously the position they had taken earlier that they would support the government's decision to break. Thirdly, if compromise proposal were advanced by Chairman at $1.50-$2.00 would they support a government decision to accept the compromise. To this question Mr. Parker, Mr. Brownlee and Mr. Wesson and Mr. Marler went further to say they would recommend as well as support such a decision. On the other hand Mr. Plumar replied in the negative saying he would have to report to his Director that he had not supported acceptance of compromise. He did not wish his position to be interpreted as implying he would criticize the government if it were to take such a decision. Except for Mr. Plumar's qualifications Sharp is satisfied that you have latitude in choosing between a break and acceptance of $1.50-$2.00 with support in either case of farm advisers.

5. Farm advisers unanimously opposed acceptance of ceiling of $1.95 even if such a decision would end conference.

6. We now seek instructions on following alternatives: one, refuse to accept any compromise on prices. Two, propose minimum of $1.50-maximum $2.00.

7. We cannot assure you that the second of these alternatives would ultimately be accepted. Indeed importers are likely to form their decision around Chairman's compromise proposal. By putting forward this proposal we therefore run the risk of break on 5 cents at ceiling as in (group corrupt). On the other hand if we merely confirm our present position and not try the $1.50-$2.00 proposal we may be missing an opportunity to reach agreement if such price would in fact be satisfactory to Canada.

8. Pursuant to my telephone conversation with you I will now make a further statement to Prices and Quantities Committee this afternoon along the lines indicated in my telephone message namely that a reduction of ten cents in ceiling price is unacceptable to Canada.

Sharp, Begins: We are advised from Washington that the instructions to the United States Delegation at the resuming Wheat Conference on April 16 will be to accept a two year agreement on the suggested terms. We understand that the instructions will envisage no possibility of agreeing to a longer agreement and that the two year duration will be a condition of U.S. participation.

2. As you know Canada was prepared to accept a one year extension of the present repeat present Agreement as a device to permit further study and negotiation and prevent the death of the Agreement. On the other hand, we were also prepared to accept a new Agreement for three years basis one dollar and fifty cents minimum, two dollars maximum. An agreement of only two years duration appears to us to be too short to be of much effect considering the small quantities that will be included.

3. It is the Minister's view, however, that Canada could not refuse to go along on a two year agreement at minimum one dollar and fifty cents, maximum two dollars if importers are agreeable and, of course, if quantities are acceptable. McNamara's letter[13] provides guidance on question of quantities. You should therefore state firmly Canada's preference for a three year agreement but be prepared at the appropriate time to go along on a two year basis. Ends.

Following for M.W. Sharp, Dept. of Trade and Commerce Repeat W.C. McNamara Wheat Board from Wilson, Begins: Following receipt of your telegram [...][14] yesterday morning Lawrie and I met with American and Australian delegations at which procedures were discussed in view of American instructions. At this meeting I asked Garthoff if in his opinion a two year agreement was their final position. He replied that he would have to have the two year proposal fully explored and rejected before going back to his authorities which he hoped would not be before Wednesday when McLain will be returning to Washington. After the meeting Sir Edwin McCarthy showed me a telegram he had received from McEwen who was in Washington on April 12 and saw McLain who indicated that two years was not necessarily the final position of the United States. Because of these indications that the American position is not as firm as that mentioned in paragraph one of your telegram, there seems to be some advantage in manoeuvring the Americans into seeking further instructions by Wednesday.

2. At Executive Committee meeting yesterday afternoon several importing countries reported acceptance of two dollar maximum one dollar fifty minimum conditional upon a three year agreement and [enforced?] [...] guaranteed quantities. To put it mildly the American statement threw the importers into confusion. After the Executive Committee meeting the importers and exporters met separately and [...] reported later that the importers meeting was most unsatisfactory. Some countries representing about six hundred thousand tons said they could not participate in an agreement for less than three years. If they are firm then remaining quantities would be less than the exporters could accept. Most of the importer delegations were reluctant to seek new instructions because of differences of opinion at home on the various terms and because reopening the question of duration would also invite revisions in the existing instructions on quantities and price. Many governments are weary of the protracted negotiations and might take the opportunity to drop out.

3. On several occasions during Thursday's and this morning's meeting the importers tried to get me to declare that Canada would not take part in an agreement of less than three years duration. Had we been able to take this stand it would have provided a rallying point around which the importers could firm up their instructions on three years. I refused to make such a statement and indicated instead that although our position has been very firm on three years, the American proposal was a new one on which I would have to seek fresh instructions as well as the representatives of the importing countries. As I see it the danger of our forcing the issue back on the Americans is that they might conclude that they would withdraw and place the responsibility on Canada for refusing to consider renewal for two years.

4. In the circumstances I thought it best to speak to the principal importers [...] this meeting and was surprised to learn that with great misgivings Germany, Belgium and the Netherlands are seeking instructions that would permit them to press for three years but as a last resort to accept two years reluctantly. The Netherlands Delegation already has some instructions. The Japanese Delegate has [...] but expressed the opinion that two years duration would not prevent their accession. [...] real concern including that of the Americans is that there not be defections among the smaller importing countries that would leave the remaining quantities unacceptable.

5. I will have to declare the Canadian position in the light of the "fresh instructions" I promised to seek by tomorrow at latest. At the moment I would recommend that I express regret that there should be a two year proposal creating fresh confusion when it had been appreciated by all at the end of the Geneva Conference general agreement could be reached on the basis of three years. Although Canada would not say that we would ultimately reject two years at the cost of having no agreement we would strongly urge concurrence by the United States in the three year proposal. I think that the main importing countries will make similar statements which would provide some basis although not too strong a one upon which the United States Delegation could go back to their authorities to seek a change in their instructions. Unless I hear from you, I will proceed on these lines. Message Ends.

TELEGRAM 501 London, April 19, 1956

CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

Following for M.W. Sharp, Department of Trade and Commerce, repeat W.C. McNamara Wheat Board, from Wilson, Begins: Your telegram 615 April 17† received and statement made in Executive Committee yesterday afternoon based on paragraph 5 of my telegram 483. Belgium, Canada, France, Ireland, Germany, New Zealand, Brazil, India, Netherlands, South Africa and Dominican Republic representatives spoke in that order in appealing to United States delegation to have their instructions altered to acceptance of three year agreement. I included in my statement that if Canada had no alternative but to accept two year agreement or no agreement at all, Canada would face its responsibilities in pursuing objectives of agreement and reluctantly accept two years although earnestly hoping that United States would not confine the conference to these two alternatives. Haeffner for Germany spoke similarly. Gartoff in summarising the appeal referred to Canada and Germany as giving qualified support to two year agreement. This the Chairman Haeffner and I emphatically denied and stressed the appeal for their acceptance of three years, in accordance with the wishes of the forty other countries. Over the past two days only Argentine and Mexico indicated that they would be content with a two year agreement.

2. Although Gartoff later accepted our statements in the sense intended and is seeking fresh instructions, if you agree I think it would be useful for you to telephone McLain directly to ensure that he is apprised of the overwhelming support still remaining for three years.

3. Ceylon reported yesterday new instructions to accept 175,000 tons in place of the 240,000 earlier submitted. The Netherlands advised yesterday only 600,000,000 bushels would be put into the Agreement for signature and that they would consider adding 100,000 tons next summer if satisfied on all points by Canada and United States in matter of recordings. As soon as I learned Netherlands had no intention of putting the 100,000 tons in question into agreement for signature, I declined to discuss merits of their complaint further, saying this was a matter for them to work out with Wheat Board within the Council. Will write McNamara further on this point.

4. With these alterations in quantities, the new grand total is now 8,004,000 tons. This figure is so low that I anticipate great difficulty in keeping the Canadian figure above a flat 100 millions in the meeting with other exporters on quantities this morning. Unless we come out above 100 millions, I shall reserve Canada's position on quantities forthwith.

5. In Executive Committee we have cleaned up all outstanding textual points in agreement. In Article XX we have provided that agreement should be open for signature in Washington until May 18. Instruments of acceptance are to be deposited by July 16 or notice of intention given by then, followed by actual acceptance not later than December 1. On this basis agreement will come into operation if two-thirds of guaranteed purchases and sales are represented by acceptances or notifications by July 16.

A revised International Wheat Agreement to follow the present Agreement, which expires on August 1, 1956, has been agreed upon in London and is open for signature in Washington until May 18. Copy of the text is attached.

The new Agreement is drafted along much the same lines as the two earlier Agreements. The basic principles remain that at the maximum price an importing country can call upon the exporting countries to make wheat available up to the importer's guaranteed quantity; and at the minimum price an exporting country can call upon importing countries to take wheat up to the exporter's guaranteed quantity. The maximum and minimum prices, however, are each five cents lower than in the current Agreement. The maximum will be $2.00 per bushel and the minimum $1.50 per bushel for No. 1 Northern in store Fort William/Port Arthur.

Although the importing countries in the current Agreement are all expected to sign the new agreement they have, taken as a whole, contracted for smaller quantities. The United Kingdom decided not to enter the Agreement. The Argentine, an important exporter, is expected to enter the Agreement for the first time. so is Sweden, also an exporter. Thus the total quantity of wheat covered by the new agreement will be less than under the current Agreement, and the Canadian share will be smaller (103 million bushels, compared with 153 million bushels).

The main value of the Agreement to Canada however will not lie in the field of guaranteed purchases or sales. (For one thing the United Kingdom, a non-member, will continue to be Canada's largest customer). The main value of the Agreement for Canada will be the fact that the countries represented — most of the world's importers and exporters of wheat make it clear by signing this Agreement that they recognize that a price range from $1.50 to $2.00 is reasonable in present circumstances. This fact in itself should give an element of stability to world trade in wheat. I understand that the farm advisers fully supported the view that these terms were acceptable.

With the concurrence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I recommend that the Canadian Ambassador in Washington be authorized to sign the International Wheat Agreement on behalf of Canada.[15]
